PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

On our present meeting, it is my first duty to invite your attention to the providential favors which our country has experienced, in the unusual degree of health dispensed to its inhabitants, and in the rich abundance with which the earth has rewarded the labors bestowed on it. In the successful cultivation of other branches of industry, and in the progress of general improvement favorable to the national prosperity, there is just occasion, also, for our mutual congratulations and thankfulness.

With these blessings are necessarily mingled the pressures and vicissitudes incident to the state of war, into which the United States have been forced by the perseverance of a foreign Power in its system of injustice and aggression.

Previous to its declaration, it was deemed proper, as a measure of precaution and forecast, that a considerable force should be placed in the Michigan Territory, with a general view to its security, and, in the event of war, to such operations in the uppermost Canada as would intercept the hostile influence of Great Britain over the savages, obtain the command of the Lake on which that part of Canada borders, and maintain co-operating relations with such forces as might be most conveniently employed against other parts. Brigadier General Hull was charged with this provisional service; having under his command a body of troops composed of regulars and volunteers from the State of Ohio. Having reached his destination after his knowledge of the war, and possessing discretionary authority to act offensively, he passed into the neighboring territory of the enemy, with a prospect of easy and victorious progress. The expedition, nevertheless, terminated unfortunately, not only in a retreat to the town and fort of Detroit, but in the surrender of both, and of the gallant corps commanded by that officer. The causes of this painful reverse will be investigated by a military tribunal.

A distinguishing feature in the operations which preceded and followed this adverse event, is the use made by the enemy of the merciless savages under their influence. Whilst the benevolent policy of the United States invariably recommended peace and promoted civilization among that wretched portion of the human race; and was making exertions to dissuade them from taking either side in the war, the enemy has not scrupled to call to his aid their ruthless ferocity, armed with the horrors of those instruments of carnage and torture which are known to spare neither age nor sex. In this outrage against the laws of honorable war, and against the feelings sacred to humanity, the British commanders cannot resort to a plea of retaliation; for it is committed in the face of our example. They cannot mitigate it, by calling it a self-defence against men in arms; for it embraces the most shocking butcheries of defenceless families. Nor can it be pretended that they are not answerable for the atrocities perpetrated; since the savages are employed with a knowledge, and even with menaces, that their fury could not be controlled. Such is the spectacle which the deputed authorities of a nation, boasting its religion and morality, have not been restrained from presenting to an enlightened age.

The misfortune at Detroit was not, however, without a consoling effect. It was followed by signal proofs that the national spirit rises according to the pressure on it. The loss of an important post, and of the brave men surrendered with it, inspired everywhere new ardor and determination. In the States and districts least remote, it was no sooner known, than every citizen was ready to fly with his arms, at once, to protect his brethren against the blood-thirsty savages let loose by the enemy on an extensive frontier, and to convert a partial calamity into a source of invigorated efforts. This patriotic zeal, which it was necessary rather to limit than excite, has embodied an ample force from the States of Kentucky and Ohio, and from parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia. It is placed, with the addition of a few regulars, under the command of Brigadier General Harrison, who possesses the entire confidence of his fellow-soldiers, among whom are citizens, some of them volunteers in the ranks, not less distinguished by their political stations, than by their personal merits. The greater portion of this force is proceeding on its destination, towards the Michigan Territory, having succeeded in relieving an important frontier post, and in several incidental operations against hostile tribes of savages, rendered indispensable by the subserviency into which they had been seduced by the enemy; a seduction the more cruel, as it could not fail to impose a necessity of precautionary severities against those who yielded to it.

At a recent date, an attack was made on a post of the enemy near Niagara, by a detachment of the regular and other forces, under the command of Major General Van Rensselaer, of the militia of the State of New York. The attack, it appears, was ordered in compliance with the ardor of the troops, who executed it with distinguished gallantry, and were, for a time, victorious; but not receiving the expected support, they were compelled to yield to reinforcements of British regulars and savages. Our loss has been considerable, and is deeply to be lamented. That of the enemy, less ascertained, will be the more felt, as it includes, among the killed, the Commanding General, who was also Governor of the Province; and was sustained by veteran troops, from inexperienced soldiers, who must daily improve in the duties of the field.

Our expectation of gaining the command of the Lakes, by the invasion of Canada from Detroit, having been disappointed, measures were instantly taken to provide, on them, a naval force superior to that of the enemy. From the talents and activity of the officer charged with this object, everything that can be done may be expected. Should the present season not admit of complete success, the progress made will insure, for the next, a naval ascendancy, where it is essential to our permanent peace with, and control over, the savages.

Among the incidents to the measures of the war, I am constrained to advert to the refusal of the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut to furnish the required detachments of militia towards the defence of the maritime frontier. The refusal was founded on a novel and unfortunate exposition of the provisions of the Constitution relating to the militia. The correspondences which will be before you, contain the requisite information on the subject. It is obvious that, if the authority of the United States to call into service and command the militia for the public defence, can be thus frustrated, even in a state of declared war, and, of course, under apprehensions of invasion preceding war, they are not one nation for the purpose most of all requiring it; and that the public safety may have no other resource, than in those large and permanent military establishments which are forbidden by the principles of our free Government, and against the necessity of which the militia were meant to be a Constitutional bulwark.

On the coasts, and on the ocean, the war has been as successful as circumstances inseparable from its early stages could promise. Our public ships and private cruisers, by their activity, and, where there was occasion, by their intrepidity, have made the enemy sensible of the difference between a reciprocity of captures, and the long confinement of them to their side. Our trade, with little exception, has safely reached our ports; having been much favored in it by the course pursued by a squadron of our frigates, under the command of Commodore Rodgers. And in the instance in which skill and bravery were more particularly tried with those of the enemy, the American flag had an auspicious triumph. The frigate Constitution, commanded by Captain Hull, after a close and short engagement, completely disabled and captured a British frigate; gaining for that officer, and all on board, a praise which cannot be too liberally bestowed; not merely for the victory actually achieved, but for that prompt and cool exertion of commanding talents, which, giving to courage its highest character, and to the force applied its full effect, proved that more could have been done in a contest requiring more.

Anxious to abridge the evils from which a state of war cannot be exempt, I lost no time, after it was declared, in conveying to the British Government the terms on which its progress might be arrested, without awaiting the delays of a formal and final pacification; and our Chargé d'Affaires at London was, at the same time, authorized to agree to an armistice founded upon them. These terms required that the Orders in Council should be repealed as they affected the United States, without a revival of blockades violating acknowledged rules; and that there should be an immediate discharge of American seamen from British ships, and a stop to impressment from American ships, with an understanding that an exclusion of the seamen of each nation from the ships of the other should be stipulated; and that the armistice should be improved into a definitive and comprehensive adjustment of depending controversies. Although a repeal of the Orders susceptible of explanations meeting the views of this Government had taken place before this pacific advance was communicated to that of Great Britain, the advance was declined, from an avowed repugnance to a suspension of the practice of impressments during the armistice, and without any intimation that the arrangement proposed, with respect to seamen, would be accepted. Whether the subsequent communications from this Government, affording an occasion for reconsidering the subject, on the part of Great Britain, will be viewed in a more favorable light, or received in a more accommodating spirit, remains to be known. It would be unwise to relax our measures, in any respect, on a presumption of such a result.

The documents from the Department of State, which relate to this subject, will give a view also of the propositions for an armistice, which have been received here, one of them from the authorities at Halifax and in Canada, the other from the British Government itself, through Admiral Warren; and of the grounds on which neither of them could be accepted.

Our affairs with France retain the posture which they held at my last communications to you. Notwithstanding the authorized expectations of an early as well as favorable issue to the discussions on foot, these have been procrastinated to the latest date. The only intervening occurrence meriting attention, is the promulgation of a French decree purporting to be a definitive repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. This proceeding, although made the ground of the repeal of the British Orders in Council, is rendered, by the time and manner of it, liable to many objections.

The final communications from our special Minister to Denmark, afford further proofs of the good effects of his mission, and of the amicable disposition of the Danish Government. From Russia, we have the satisfaction to receive assurances of continued friendship, and that it will not be affected by the rupture between the United States and Great Britain. Sweden also professes sentiments favorable to the subsisting harmony.

With the Barbary Powers, excepting that of Algiers, our affairs remain on the ordinary footing. The Consul General, residing with that Regency, has suddenly, and without cause, been banished, together with all the American citizens found there. Whether this was the transitory effect of capricious despotism, or the first act of predetermined hostility, is not ascertained. Precautions were taken by the Consul on the latter supposition.

The Indian tribes, not under foreign instigations, remain at peace, and receive the civilizing attentions which have proved so beneficial to them.

With a view to that vigorous prosecution of the war, to which our national faculties are adequate, the attention of Congress will be particularly drawn to the insufficiency of existing provisions for filling up the Military Establishment. Such is the happy condition of our country, arising from the facility of subsistence and the high wages for every species of occupation, that, notwithstanding the augmented inducements provided at the last session, a partial success only has attended the recruiting service. The deficiency has been necessarily supplied during the campaign by other than regular troops, with all the inconveniences and expense incident to them. The remedy lies in establishing, more favorably for the private soldier, the proportion between his recompense and the term of his enlistment. And it is a subject which cannot too soon or too seriously be taken into consideration.

The same insufficiency has been experienced in the provisions for volunteers made by an act of the last session. The recompense for the service required in this case is still less attractive than in the other. And although patriotism alone has sent into the field some valuable corps of that description, those alone who can afford the sacrifice can be reasonably expected to yield to that impulse.

It will merit consideration, also, whether, as auxiliary to the security of our frontiers, corps may not be advantageously organized, with a restriction of their services to particular districts convenient to them. And whether the local and occasional services of mariners and others in the seaport towns, under a similar organization, would not be a provident addition to the means of their defence.

I recommend a provision for an increase of the general officers of the Army, the deficiency of which has been illustrated by the number and distance of separate commands, which the course of the war and the advantage of the service have required.

And I cannot press too strongly on the earliest attention of the Legislature, the importance of the reorganization of the staff establishment, with a view to render more distinct and definite the relations and responsibilities of its several departments. That there is room for improvements which will materially promote both economy and success, in what appertains to the Army and the war, is equally inculcated by the examples of other countries, and by the experience of our own.

A revision of the militia laws for the purpose of rendering them more systematic, and better adapting them to the emergencies of the war, is, at this time, particularly desirable.

Of the additional ships authorized to be fitted for service, two will be shortly ready to sail; a third is under repair, and delay will be avoided in the repair of the residue. Of the appropriations for the purchase of materials for ship building, the greater part has been applied to that object, and the purchase will be continued with the balance.

The enterprising spirit which has characterized our naval force, and its success, both in restraining insults and depredations on our coasts, and in reprisals on the enemy, will not fail to recommend an enlargement of it.

There being reason to believe that the act prohibiting the acceptance of British licenses is not a sufficient guard against the use of them for purposes favorable to the interests and views of the enemy, further provisions on that subject are highly important. Nor is it less so, that penal enactments should be provided for cases of corrupt and perfidious intercourse with the enemy, not amounting to treason, nor yet embraced by any statutory provisions.

A considerable number of American vessels which were in England when the revocation of the Orders in Council took place, were laden with British manufactures, under an erroneous impression that the non-importation act would immediately cease to operate, and have arrived in the United States. It did not appear proper to exercise, on unforeseen cases of such magnitude, the ordinary powers vested in the Treasury Department to mitigate forfeitures, without previously affording to Congress an opportunity of making on the subject such provisions as they may think proper. In their decision, they will doubtless equally consult what is due to equitable considerations and to the public interest.

The receipts into the Treasury during the year ending on the 30th of September last, have exceeded sixteen millions and a half of dollars; which have been sufficient to defray all the demands on the Treasury to that day, including a necessary reimbursement of near three millions of the principal of the public debt. In these receipts is included a sum of near five millions eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars, received on account of the loans authorized by the acts of the last session: the whole sum actually obtained on loan amounts to eleven millions of dollars, the residue of which, being receivable subsequent to the 30th of September last, will, together with the current revenue, enable us to defray all the expenses of this year.

The duties on the late unexpected importations of British manufactures will render the revenue of the ensuing year more productive than could have been anticipated.

The situation of our country, fellow-citizens, is not without its difficulties; though it abounds in animating considerations, of which the view here presented of our pecuniary resources is an example. With more than one nation we have serious and unsettled controversies; and with one, powerful in the means and habits of war, we are at war. The spirit and strength of the nation are nevertheless equal to the support of all its rights, and to carry it through all its trials. They can be met in that confidence. Above all, we have the inestimable consolation of knowing that the war in which we are actually engaged, is a war neither of ambition nor of vain glory; that it is waged, not in violation of the rights of others, but in the maintenance of our own; that it was preceded by a patience without example, under wrongs accumulating without end: and that it was finally not declared until every hope of averting it was extinguished, by the transfer of the British sceptre into new hands clinging to former councils; and until declarations were reiterated to the last hour, through the British Envoy here, that the hostile edicts against our commercial rights and our maritime independence would not be revoked; nay, that they could not be revoked without violating the obligations of Great Britain to other Powers, as well as to her own interests. To have shrunk, under such circumstances, from manly resistance, would have been a degradation blasting our best and proudest hopes; it would have struck us from the high rank where the virtuous struggles of our fathers had placed us, and have betrayed the magnificent legacy which we hold in trust for future generations. It would have acknowledged, that, on the element which forms three-fourths of the globe we inhabit, and where all independent nations have equal and common rights, the American people were not an independent people, but colonists and vassals. It was at this moment, and with such an alternative, that war was chosen. The nation felt the necessity of it, and called for it. The appeal was accordingly made, in a just cause, to the just and all powerful Being who holds in his hand the chain of events, and the destiny of nations. It remains only, that, faithful to ourselves, entangled in no connexions with the views of other Powers, and ever ready to accept peace from the hand of justice, we prosecute the war with united counsels and with the ample faculties of the nation, until peace be so obtained, and as the only means, under the Divine blessing, of speedily obtaining it. JAMES MADISON.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization," which passed the two Houses at the last session of Congress, having appeared to me liable to abuse by aliens having no real purpose of effectuating a naturalization, and therefore not been signed; and having been presented at an hour too near the close of the session to be returned with objections for reconsideration, the bill failed to become a law. I also recommend that provision be now made in favor of aliens entitled to the contemplated benefit, under such regulations as will prevent advantage being taken of it for improper purposes.

CAPTURE OF BRITISH VESSELS.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate copies of the correspondence called for by their resolution of the 7th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 13, 1813.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and referred to the committee appointed the 9th November, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Naval Establishment, to consider and report thereon.

The documents are as follow:

BLACK ROCK, October 9, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the morning of the 8th instant, two British vessels, which I was informed were His Britannic Majesty's brig Detroit, late the United States' brig Adams, and the brig Hunter, mounting fourteen guns, but which afterwards proved to be the brig Caledonia, both said to be well armed and manned, came down the lake, and anchored under the protection of Fort Erie. Having been on the lines for some time, and in a measure inactively employed, I determined to make an attack, and, if possible, get possession of them; a strong inducement to this attempt arose from a conviction that, with those two vessels, added to those which I have purchased and am fitting out, I should be able to meet the remainder of the British force on the upper lakes, and save an incalculable expense and labor to the Government. On the morning of their arrival, I heard that our seamen were but a short distance from this place, and immediately despatched an express to the officers, directing them to use all possible despatch in getting the men to this place, as I had important service to perform. On their arrival, which was about 12 o'clock, I discovered that they had only twenty pistols, and neither cutlasses, nor battle axes; but on application to Generals Smyth and Hall, of the regulars and militia, I was supplied with a few arms, and General Smyth was so good, on my request, as immediately to detach fifty men from the regulars, armed with muskets; by four o'clock, in the afternoon, I had my men selected and stationed in two boats which I had previously prepared for the purpose; with those boats, fifty men in each, and under circumstances very disadvantageous, my men having had scarcely time to refresh themselves, after a fatiguing march of five hundred miles, I put off from the mouth of Buffalo creek, at one o'clock the following morning; and at three I was alongside the vessels; in about ten minutes I had the prisoners all secured, the topsails sheeted home, and the vessels under way; unfortunately the wind was not sufficiently strong to get me up against a rapid current into the lake, where I understood another armed vessel lay at anchor, and I was obliged to run down the river by the forts, under a heavy fire of round, grape, and canister, from a number of pieces of heavy ordnance, and several pieces of flying artillery; was compelled to anchor at a distance of about four hundred yards from two of their batteries. After the discharge of the first gun, which was from the flying artillery, I hauled to the shore, and observed to the officer that if another gun was fired, I would bring the prisoners on deck, and expose them to the fate we should all share; but notwithstanding they disregarded the caution, continuing a constant and destructive fire, one single moment's reflection determined me not to commit an act that would subject me to the imputation of barbarity. The Caledonia had been beached in as safe a position as the circumstances would admit of, under one of our batteries at Black Rock; I now brought all the guns of the Detroit on one side, next the enemy, stationed the men at them, and directed a fire, which was continued as long as our ammunition lasted, and circumstances permitted. During the contest, I endeavored to get the Detroit on our side, by sending a line (there being no wind) on shore, with all the line I could muster; but the current being so strong the boat could not reach the shore. I then hauled on shore, and requested that warps should be made fast on the land and sent on board, the attempt to do which again proved useless. As the fire was such as would, in all probability, sink the vessel in a short time, I determined to drop down the river, out of reach of the batteries, and make a stand against the flying artillery. I accordingly cut the cable and made sail, with very light airs, and at that instant discovered that the pilot had abandoned me. I dropped astern, for about ten minutes, when I was brought up on our shore, on Squaw island; got the boarding boat made, had all the prisoners put in and sent on shore, with directions for the officer to return for me, and what property we could get from the brig; he did not return, owing to the difficulty of the boat's getting ashore. Discovering a skiff under the counter, I sent the four remaining prisoners in the boat, and, with my officer, I went on shore to bring the boat off; I asked for protection to the brig of Lieutenant Colonel Scott, who readily gave it; at this moment I discovered a boat, with about forty soldiers, from the British side, making for the brig; they got on board, but were soon compelled to abandon her, with the loss of nearly all their men. During the whole of this morning both sides of the river kept up, alternately, a constant fire on the brig, and so much injured her that it was impossible to have floated her. Before I left her, she had received twelve shot, of large size, in her bends, her sails in ribands, and her rigging all cut to pieces. To my officers and men, I feel under great obligations; to Captain Towson, and Lieutenant Roach, of the second regiment of artillery; Ensign Prestman, of the infantry; to Cornelius Chapin, Mr. John McComb, Messrs. John Tower, Thomas Davis, Peter Overtacks, James Sloan, resident gentlemen of Buffalo, for their soldier and sailor-like conduct; in a word, every man fought with their hearts animated only by the interest and honor of their country. The prisoners I have turned over to the military. The Detroit mounted six six-pound long guns; a commanding lieutenant, a lieutenant of marines, a boatswain and gunner, and fifty-six men; about thirty American prisoners on board; muskets, pistols, and battle-axes; in boarding her, I lost one man, one officer wounded; Mr. John C. Cummings, acting midshipman, a bayonet through the leg; his conduct was correct, and deserves the notice of the Department.

The Caledonia mounted two small guns, blunderbusses, pistols, muskets, cutlasses, and boarding pistols; twelve men, including officers; ten prisoners on board; the boat boarding her, commanded by Sailing-master George Watts, performed his duty in a masterly style; but one man killed and four wounded badly, I am afraid, mortally.

I enclose you a list of the officers and men engaged in the enterprise, and also a view of the lake and river in the different situations of attack; in a day or two I shall forward the names of the prisoners. The Caledonia belongs to the Northwest Company, laden with furs, worth, I understood, two hundred thousand dollars.

BLACK ROCK, October 10, 1812.

SIR: In my letter of yesterday's date, I stated my intention to enclose to you a list of the officers and men engaged with me in capturing His Britannic Majesty's brig, the Detroit, and brig Caledonia. The incessant fire of the enemy, and my own constant engagements for the protection of the vessels, compel me to postpone sending that list until another opportunity. Last evening, having observed an intention, on the part of the enemy, to remove the ordnance and military stores with which the Detroit was charged, I determined at once to set her on fire; thereby to prevent her having the aid of masts and yards in getting her guns into boats, she having five twelve-pound guns in her hold, and six six-pounders upon her deck, that I could prepare them, and, with my sailors, remove the ordnance during the night, when unobserved by the enemy. These preparations I am now making, and shall, with as much expedition as possible, continue to get the ordnance, and place it in our battery, as we are much in want—not one piece at Black Rock. The Caledonia I have perfectly recovered from the enemy.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

Capture of British Vessels on Lake Erie.

SENATE.

BLACK ROCK, Oct. 10, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the morning of the 6th instant, two vessels, under British colors, came down Lake Erie, and anchored under the protection of Fort Erie; that, on the same day, a detachment of men arrived from New York, accompanied by Sailingmasters Watts and Chisson, with some masters' mates and midshipmen; that, on the morning following, I, with two boats previously prepared for the purpose, boarded and took possession of them, with the loss of two men killed, Samuel Fortune and Daniel Martin, and four wounded—Acting Midshipman John C. Cummings, John Garling, Nathan Armstrong, Jerome Sardie, and John Yosen. As there is not a probability of your receiving this shortly, I have made a communication to the Department upon the subject, a copy of which I enclose for your perusal. I beg you will not have conceived me hasty in making this attack. I acted as if the action came directly from yourself.

Let me recommend to your particular attention the officers and men who performed this service—each and all did their duty. The ensign of the Adams I will send you at an early opportunity; it is at your disposal. The particulars, as it regards the vessels, I will forward you in a day or two; at present I am much engaged. With sentiments, &c.

P. S. I have neglected mentioning to you the names of the vessels captured. One, His Britannic Majesty's brig, "the Detroit," formerly the United States' brig Adams; the other, a brig belonging to the Northwest Company, loaded with skins, called the Caledonia.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, October 16, 1812.

SIR: I have great pleasure in informing you that, by a gentleman who arrived here yesterday afternoon, from Buffalo, I learn that Lieutenant Elliott, with about sixty sailors, and a number of volunteer militia, cut out from under the guns of Fort Erie, on the night of the 8th instant, the brig Adams (lately surrendered at Detroit) and the schooner Caledonia, laden with peltry, said to be very valuable; but, in running these vessels for Black Rock, they both grounded, in such a situation that the British fort was firing on them, when my informant left there on Friday morning last. It was, however, believed that, if they could not be got off, they could be destroyed. I, however, hope that Lieutenant Elliott will be able to save both vessels; for, such an addition to our little force on Lake Erie, at this time, would be invaluable. Lieutenant Elliott deserves much praise for the promptness with which he executed this service; as the sailors had only arrived at Black Rock on the 8th, and he had no particular orders from me, except to have boats built and prepared for cutting out the British vessels, which I knew rendezvoused near Fort Erie. If Lieutenant Elliott succeed in saving the Adams and Caledonia, I think that we shall obtain the command of Lake Erie before December; but, as to this lake, I hardly know what to say, as there has not a single pound of powder, nor a gun, arrived yet, and I can make no calculation when any will arrive. I feel quite discouraged, and shall be tempted to seek the enemy, with the Oneida alone, if the guns do not arrive soon.

The sailors have all arrived at their places of destination; but the marines have not arrived. I, however, hope to see them to-day or to-morrow.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

HON. PAUL HAMILTON,

SACKETT'S HARBOR, October 27, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing you copies of two letters from Lieutenant Elliott, giving an account of his having cut out from under Fort Erie, on Lake Erie, in a most gallant manner, two British brigs, the Detroit (late Adams) and the Caledonia. The Detroit was manned and armed as a man of war; the Caledonia belonged to the Northwest Company, and was loaded with peltry.

Nothing that I can say, more than I have already said in a former communication upon this subject, will add to the credit of Lieutenant Elliott, and the gallant officers and men who accompanied him. The thing speaks for itself, and will, I am sure, be duly appreciated by all who may have any idea of the difficulties that he had to encounter, after getting possession of these vessels. I have the honor to be, &c.

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

HON. PAUL HAMILTON,

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8, 1812.

SIR: In answer to your note, requesting of me "a general description of the armament and stores on board at the time of the capture of the Adams, and the probable number of men," I can state, that I sailed from Malden in the Adams, and arrived at Fort Erie on the morning preceding the night in which you captured that vessel. I left her in the afternoon, and crossed in her boat to Buffalo, with a flag. When I left the Adams, she had on board five guns mounted, (six and four pounders,) and six long twelves in her hold. She had also on board a quantity of powder and ball, and a number of boxes of muskets. I am not able to state, of my own knowledge, the number of stand of arms, but I have been informed that nearly all the arms taken at Detroit were on board; if that was the fact, the number must have been two thousand. The number of the crew that I left on board could not vary much from sixty, and the number of American prisoners about thirty, including three officers. I have the honor to be, &c.

HARRIS H. HICKMAN.

Lieut. D. ELLIOTT, U. S. Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Oct. 27, 1812.

SIR: I have received, with great satisfaction, your communication of the ninth instant, and have been desired by the President of the United States to return to you, and through you to the officers and men under your command, in the expedition to Fort Erie, which terminated to the glory of the American arms, his particular thanks. I am, with great respect, &c.

PAUL HAMILTON.

P. S. Your having abstained from fulfilling your intimation that you would expose your prisoners to the enemy's fire, is highly approved.

OHIO RESOLUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of the State of Ohio, enclosing the declaration and resolves of the General Assembly of that State, approbatory of the measures of the Administration in regard to the war with England, and pledging themselves and their constituents to aid in its prosecution.

The letter and resolutions were as follow:

CHILICOTHE, January 10, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit you the enclosed declaration, and am, with high esteem, your obedient servant,

R. J. MEIGS.

Hon. the SPEAKER of the Senate U. S.

Declaration and Resolves of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio.

It has pleased Divine Providence that this General Assembly should convene under circumstances new, replete with interest, and of great national concern. While the moral and political convulsions of Europe have shaken empires from their centre, this nation has, alone, pursued a peaceful policy. It has grown in wealth, it has increased in importance, until its power has become a cause of jealousy among the nations of the old world, and its wealth has but too effectually invited their rapacity.

Endeavoring to surmount injustice, with its view fixed on peace, and with exertions never suspended, the American Administration has determined, if practicable, to elude the evils of war. Mildness has characterized its manner, and justice has been its whole demand: but forbearance has been in vain. Forgetting the principles of justice, and regardless of our unquestioned rights, the great contending Powers of Europe have reduced plunder to system, and, in that system, unremittently persevere. Nor is this all: the British nation has superadded personal oppression, and the cruel enslavement of our citizens; and, even when professedly at peace with the United States, she has been perfidiously accessory to the murder of our frontier inhabitants, by instigating and aiding her savage allies, whose cruel mode of warfare is disgraceful to humanity. Still was she invited to be just. While the sword was yet starting from its scabbard, the olive branch was cordially offered to the enemy; but this offer is refused, and the only Republic which has survived the general wreck of nations is in open war.

Impressed with a full conviction that the war in which this nation is involved is, on our part, just and necessary; that the course pursued by the Administration, in recommending the measure, and its mild, conciliatory, and continued efforts to secure to this nation an honorable peace, merit the entire approbation of this General Assembly; and that not only the honor and dignity of this people, but its continuance as a free and independent nation, depend upon a vigorous prosecution of the war: therefore,

Resolved, by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That, in the name, and in behalf of our constituents, we pledge ourselves to aid the National Government, in the present emergency, to the extent of our resources; and we do this in the hope that the goodly heritage of our freedom may descend from us to posterity, as we received it, excellent and unimpaired.

Be it further resolved, That we have seen, with emotions of much concern, the protracted delay of the French Government to render justice to this nation for its outrageous depredations upon us, and that we will afford to the constituted authorities, in whose wisdom and firmness we place confident reliance, our utmost support in their efforts to sustain the honor of the nation, and to obtain suitable amends for its injuries.

Be it further resolved, That, in the opinion of this General Assembly, every republican is now peculiarly called upon, by all honorable and honest motives, to sacrifice, at the shrine of his country, political dissensions and personal animosities, and, with united efforts, to rescue from danger that civil and political liberty, for which our fathers so arduously struggled and so freely bled.

Be it further resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, one copy each of the foregoing declaration and resolutions.

JOHN POLLOCK,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

THOMAS KIRKER,

Speaker of the Senate.

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution:

"That, for the purpose of choosing representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of representatives to which such State may be entitled.

"Those districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, entitled by the Constitution to be represented; in each district the qualified voters shall elect one representative, and no more.

"That, for the purpose of appointing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Electors to which such State may be entitled: those districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, entitled by the Constitution to representation. In each district the persons qualified to vote for representatives shall appoint one Elector, and no more. The Electors, when convened, shall have power, in case one or more of those appointed as above prescribed shall fail to attend for the purposes of their said appointment on the day prescribed for giving their votes for President and Vice President of the United States, to appoint another or others to act in the place of him or them so failing to attend.

"Neither the districts for choosing representatives, nor those for appointing Electors, shall be altered in any State, until a census and apportionment of representatives under it, made subsequent to the division of the State into districts, shall change the number of representatives and of Electors to which such State may be entitled. The division of the States into districts hereby provided for shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted and ratified as a part of the Constitution of the United States, and successively afterwards, whenever by a census and apportionment of representatives and of Electors to which any State may be entitled, shall be changed; the division of such State into districts, for the purposes both of choosing representatives and of appointing Electors, shall be altered agreeably to the provisions of this amendment, and on no other occasion."

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to raise an additional military force,' and for other purposes;" and Mr. ANDERSON was requested to take the Chair; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

"2. Registered ships or vessels, which may be cleared for foreign voyages, shall have American officers and employ American mariners for such navigation, wholly, or in some proportion not less than a majority of the crew in any case; otherwise, they shall not by law enjoy the privileges of merchant vessels of the United States.

"3. Vessels enrolled and licensed for coasting or fishing shall not continue to enjoy the privileges allowed by law for encouraging the coasting trade and fisheries of the United States, unless the whole, or at least the majority, of the mariners employed on board the same, as well as the masters or skippers, respectively, shall be American citizens by birth or regular adoption.

"4. The mode of proving the citizenship of mariners or apprentices, duly shipped or serving on board such private vessels, shall be directed by law, so that the same may be entitled to credit within the United States.

"5. All American mariners and apprentices, so proved, and belonging to the crew of a merchant vessel of the United States, bound on any foreign voyage permitted by law, shall be comprehended and described in an official document, or sea paper, authenticated for the use of the vessel during the voyage; and, on the vessel's return and arrival within a district of the United States, the production of such document, as well as the vessel's register, or satisfactory proof of its loss, and a specification of the officers and crew, as well as a return of passengers on board, with proof of having continued to employ American seamen, according to law, shall be requisite for enjoying the exemptions and privileges of the navigation of the United States in relation to duties, imposts, charges, or regulations of trade. The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a letter, with accompanying documents, from Captain Bainbridge, now commanding the United States' frigate, the Constitution, reporting his capture and destruction of the British frigate, the Java. The circumstances and the issue of this combat, afford another example of the professional skill and heroic spirit which prevail in our naval service.

12th CON. 2d SESS.—4

The signal display of both, by Captain Bainbridge, his officers, and crew, command the highest praise.

This being a second instance in which the condition of the captured ship, by rendering it impossible to get her into port, has barred a contemplated reward of successful valor, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the equity and propriety of a general provision, allowing, in such cases, both past and future, a fair proportion of the value which would accrue to the captors, on the safe arrival and sale of the prize.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 22, 1813.

The Message and accompanying documents were read, and referred to the committee appointed the 9th of November, who have under consideration the naval affairs of the United States, to consider and report thereon.

TUESDAY, February 23.

merchandise, captured by private armed vessels," was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GILES, LLOYD, and BAYARD, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom were referred the memorials of John Worthington, and others, and Oliver Evans, and agreed thereto, as follows:

"That the subject of the memorials is of considerable interest and importance to the community, and involves difficulties which would require more time and patient investigation fully to understand than can be bestowed upon it during the remnant of the present session.

"The committee confine themselves to stating that the grievance complained of by the memorialists first mentioned proceeds from an act of Congress, passed the 21st day of January, in the year 1808, whereby a patent, which had before that time been granted to Oliver Evans for fourteen years, for certain mill machinery, and which had expired by its own limitation, was renewed and continued for fourteen years from the date of the act. It appears that, in the interval between the expiration and renewal of the patent, several grist mills were erected, into which the use of Mr. Evans's machinery was introduced.

"By a judicial construction of the act of Congress, it is held to prohibit the use of the machinery after the passing of the act, without the license of the patentee, although the mill and machinery were constructed when no patent or exclusive right existed.

"It also appears that the price at which Mr. Evans rated his licenses before the act of 1808, for one water wheel, was from thirty to forty dollars.

"Since that act, his prices have been gradually augmented, and he now requires from three to four hundred dollars for the machinery used in the manufacture of flour by each pair of stones of six feet diameter.

"In a single mill, having several pair of stones, a demand was made of two thousand two hundred dollars for the use of the machinery.

"The machinery is undeniably of great importance to the public, but the increased and increasing prices of the patentee threaten the imposition of an intolerable burden upon a very useful and important class of manufactures.

"The committee are not prepared to recommend any specific relief in the case; and, conceiving that it deserves more attention than it can receive during the present session, consider that it would be advisable to abstain from acting upon the subject at this time, and to leave it to the maturer consideration of the ensuing Congress. The following resolution is submitted:

"Resolved, That the committee to whom were referred the memorials of John Worthington, and others, and of Oliver Evans, be discharged from the further consideration of the subject of the said memorials."

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress copies of a proclamation of the British Lieutenant Governor of the Island of Bermuda, which has appeared under circumstances leaving no doubt of its authenticity. It recites a British Order in Council of the 26th of October last, providing for the supply of the British West Indies, and other colonial possessions, by a trade under special licenses; and is accompanied by a circular instruction to the Colonial Governors, which confines licensed importations from ports of the United States to the ports of the Eastern States exclusively.

The Government of Great Britain had already introduced into her commerce, during war, a system, which, at once violating the rights of other nations, and resting on a mass of forgery and perjury unknown to other times, was making an unfortunate progress in undermining those principles of morality and religion which are the best foundation of national happiness.

The policy now proclaimed to the world introduces into her modes of warfare a system equally distinguished by the deformity of its features, and the depravity of its character; having for its object to dissolve the ties of allegiance and the sentiments of loyalty in the adversary nation, and to seduce and separate its component parts the one from the other.

The general tendency of these demoralizing and disorganizing contrivances will be reprobated by the civilized and Christian world; and the insulting attempt on the virtue, the honor, the patriotism, and the fidelity of our brethren of the Eastern States, will not fail to call forth all their indignation and resentment, and to attach more and more all the States to that happy Union and Constitution, against which such insidious and malignant artifices are directed.

The better to guard, nevertheless, against the effect of individual cupidity and treachery, and to turn the corrupt projects of the enemy against himself, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of an effectual prohibition of any trade whatever, by citizens or inhabitants of the United States, under special licenses, whether relating to persons or ports, and in aid thereof a prohibition of all exportations from the United States in foreign bottoms, few of which are actually employed, whilst multiplying counterfeits of their flags and papers are covering and encouraging the navigation of the enemy.

JAMES MADISON.

INAUGURAL SPEECH.

From the National Intelligencer of March 5, 1813.

Yesterday being the day on which commenced the second term of Mr. Madison's re-election to the Presidency, he took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, administered to him by Chief Justice Marshall, in the presence of many members of Congress, the Judges of the Supreme Court, the foreign Ministers, and a great concourse of ladies and gentlemen. The President was escorted to the Capitol by the cavalry of the District, and received, on his approach to it, by the several volunteer corps of this city, Georgetown, and Alexandria, drawn up in line for the purpose. Previous to taking the oath in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, the President delivered the following

SPEECH:

About to add the solemnity of an oath to the obligations imposed by a second call to the station, in which my country heretofore placed me, I find, in the presence of this respectable assembly, an opportunity of publicly repeating my profound sense of so distinguished a confidence, and of the responsibility united with it. The impressions on me are strengthened by such an evidence, that my faithful endeavors to discharge my arduous duties have been favorably estimated; and by a consideration of the momentous period at which the trust has been renewed. From the weight and magnitude now belonging to it, I should be compelled to shrink, if I had less reliance on the support of an enlightened and generous people, and felt less deeply a conviction, that the war with a powerful nation, which forms so prominent a feature in our situation, is stamped with that justice, which invites the smiles of Heaven on the means of conducting it to a successful termination.

May we not cherish this sentiment, without presumption, when we reflect on the characters by which this war is distinguished?

It was not declared on the part of the United States, until it had been long made on them, in reality, though not in name; until arguments and expostulations had been exhausted; until a positive declaration had been received, that the wrongs provoking it would not be discontinued; nor until this last appeal could no longer be delayed without breaking down the spirit of the nation, destroying all confidence in itself and in its political institutions, and either perpetuating a state of disgraceful suffering, or regaining, by more costly sacrifices and more severe struggles, our lost rank and respect among independent Powers.

On the issue of the war are staked our national sovereignty on the high seas, and the security of an important class of citizens, whose occupations give the proper value to those of every other class. Not to contend for such a stake, is to surrender our equality with other Powers on the element common to all, and to violate the sacred title which every member of the society has to its protection. I need not call into view the unlawfulness of the practice by which our mariners are forced, at the will of every cruising officer, from their own vessels into foreign ones, nor paint the outrages inseparable from it. The proofs are in the records of each successive administration of our Government; and the cruel sufferings of that portion of the American people have found their way to every bosom not dead to the sympathies of human nature.

As the war was just in its origin, and necessary and noble in its objects, we can reflect with a proud satisfaction, that, in carrying it on, no principle of justice or honor, no usage of civilized nations, no precept of courtesy or humanity have been infringed. The war has been waged on our part with scrupulous regard to all these obligations, and in a spirit of liberality which was never surpassed.

How little has been the effect of this example on the conduct of the enemy!

They have retained as prisoners of war citizens of the United States, not liable to be so considered under the usages of war.

They have refused to consider as prisoners of war, and threatened to punish as traitors and deserters, persons emigrating, without restraint, to the United States; incorporated, by naturalization into our political family, and fighting under the authority of their adopted country, in open and honorable war, for the maintenance of its rights and safety. Such is the avowed purpose of a Government which is in the practice of naturalizing, by thousands, citizens of other countries, and not only of permitting, but compelling, them to fight its battles against their native country.

Confidential Proceedings.

They have not, it is true, taken into their own hands the hatchet and the knife, devoted to indiscriminate massacre; but they have let loose the savages, armed with these cruel instruments; have allured them into their service, and carried them to battle by their sides, eager to glut their savage thirst with the blood of the vanquished, and to finish the work of torture and death on maimed and defenceless captives: and, what was never before seen, British commanders have extorted victory over the unconquerable valor of our troops, by presenting to the sympathy of their chief awaiting massacre from their savage associates.

And now we find them, in further contempt of the modes of honorable warfare, supplying the place of a conquering force, by attempts to disorganize our political society, to dismember our confederated Republic. Happily, like others, these will recoil on the authors; but they mark the degenerate counsels from which they emanate: and if they did not belong to a series of unexampled inconsistencies, might excite the greater wonder, as proceeding from a Government which founded the very war in which it has been so long engaged, on a charge against the disorganizing and insurrectional policy of its adversary.

To render the justice of the war on our part the more conspicuous, the reluctance to commence it was followed by the earliest and strongest manifestations of a disposition to arrest its progress. The sword was scarcely out of the scabbard, before the enemy was apprized of the reasonable terms on which it would be resheathed. Still more precise advances were repeated, and have been received in a spirit forbidding every reliance not placed on the military resources of the nation.

These resources are amply sufficient to bring the war to an honorable issue. Our nation is, in number, more than half that of the British isles. It is composed of a brave, a free, a virtuous, and an intelligent people. Our country abounds in the necessities, the arts, and the comforts of life. A general prosperity is visible in the public countenance. The means employed by the British Cabinet to undermine it, have recoiled on themselves; have given to our national faculties a more rapid development; and draining or diverting the precious metals from British circulation and British vaults, have poured them into those of the United States. It is a propitious consideration, that an unavoidable war should have found this seasonable facility for the contributions required to support it. When the public voice called for war, all knew and still know, that without them it could not be carried on through the period which it might last; and the patriotism, the good sense, and the manly spirit of our fellow-citizens, are pledges for the cheerfulness with which they will bear each his share of the common burden. To render the war short, and its success sure, animated, and systematic exertions alone are necessary; and the success of our arms now may long preserve our country from the necessity of another resort to them. Already have the gallant exploits of our naval heroes proved to the world our inherent capacity to maintain our rights on one element. If the reputation of our arms has been thrown under clouds on the other, presaging flashes of heroic enterprise assure us that nothing is wanting to correspondent triumphs there also, but the discipline and habits which are in daily progress.

CONSTITUTION AND THE GUERRIERE.

Mr. DAWSON rose and said:—Mr. Speaker, I take this early moment to present to you a resolution which I feel pleasure and pride in believing will meet the general approbation, not only of this House, but of the nation.

The President of the United States, in his Message, which was read on yesterday, has, in terms eloquent and appropriate, made mention of an engagement which has taken place between an American frigate and one of His Britannic Majesty's, which has rendered to the officers and crew of our frigate that justice which they so justly merited; an engagement in which American tars have proven to the world, that when commanded by officers of skill, valor, and fidelity, they are capable of contending with, and of vanquishing, those of any nation on the earth, upon any element—even on that element where British skill has so justly acquired so much celebrity, and that the American flag, when authorized by the constituted authorities of our country, will command respect on the high road of nations. Far, very far, be it from me to boast—it ill becomes an individual or a nation, and is never the concomitant of true courage; but on the present occasion it seems to me proper that we should express our sentiments—our feelings, and thereby the feelings of the nation. I shall, therefore, without further comment, offer you the following resolution, observing that the facts stated have been ascertained at the proper department, and the proofs are on my table:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to present, in the name of Congress, to Captain Isaac Hull, a gold medal, with suitable emblems and devices; and that the sum of — thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be distributed as prize money to the officers and crew of the United States' frigate the Constitution, of forty-four guns, according to the provisions of the act for the better government of the Navy of the United States; in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry, good conduct, and services of Captain Hull, the officers, and crew, of the said frigate Constitution, in attacking, vanquishing, and capturing the British frigate the Guerriere, mounting fifty-four carriage guns, thereby exhibiting an example highly honorable to the American character, and instructive to our rising Navy.

Some conversation passed on the proper mode of disposing of this subject, in the course of which

H. OF R.

Mr. SEYBERT suggested the propriety of also giving some distinctive or medals to the crew of the Constitution, who he thought were too generally overlooked in such cases.

Mr. WRIGHT approved the spirit of the resolution, but hoped the other officers would receive swords, and the men suitable rewards; and confidently hoped a gold medal would be voted to the nearest relative of Lieutenant William Bush of the marines, a young gentleman from his district, who fell gallantly fighting in that action, covered with wounds and glory; he, therefore, for that purpose, moved that the resolution be referred to a select committee.

The resolution was eventually ordered to lie on the table, till a committee should be appointed to whom it should be referred.

FRIDAY, November 6.

Several other members, to wit: from New Jersey, GEORGE C. MAXWELL; from Massachusetts, EZEKIEL BACON; from Connecticut, LEWIS B. STURGES; and from Pennsylvania, JAMES MILNOR; appeared and took their seats.

GEORGE POINDEXTER, the Delegate from the Mississippi Territory, also appeared; and took his seat.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, returning, with objections, the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization," which passed the two Houses at the last session of Congress.

The Message was read, and referred to a select committee; and Mr. LACOCK, Mr. ROANE, Mr. EMMOTT, Mr. RICHARDSON, and Mr. McKIM, were appointed the committee.

Another Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of the correspondence between the Department of War and the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut, referred to in his Message of the fourth instant.

The Message was read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion, by Mr. DAWSON, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday; and the same being read, was referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the Naval Establishment, to the past operations, and to the future prosecution of the war on the ocean and on the lakes.

The House then proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a Chaplain; and, upon an examination of the ballots, it appeared that the Rev. JESSE LEE was duly chosen.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, to whom had been referred the President's Message, Mr. MACON in the Chair.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the following resolutions were put, and carried nem. con.:

1. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the 4th instant, as relates to the subject of our foreign relations, be referred to a select committee.

2. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message aforesaid, as relates to the militia, volunteers, and the Army, of the United States, to the past operations, and to the future prosecution of the war with Great Britain on land, together with the Message of this day, be referred to a select committee.

3. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message of the 4th instant, as relates to the Naval Establishment of the United States, to the past operations, and to the future prosecution of the war on the ocean and on the lakes, be referred to a select committee.

4. Resolved, That so much of the said Message as relates to the revenue and to the late importations of British manufactures, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

5. Resolved, That so much of the said Message as relates to British licenses, and to "cases of corrupt and perfidious intercourse with the enemy, not amounting to treason," be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The Committee rose, and reported these resolutions; which were agreed to by the House. And MESSRS. SMILIE, CALHOUN, GRUNDY, GOLDSBOROUGH, MACON, NELSON, HARPER, DESHA, and SEAYER, were appointed the committee, pursuant to the first resolution.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS, TROUP, WRIGHT, SEVIER, LOWNDES, CHITTENDEN, LYLE, STUART, and AVERY, were appointed the committee, pursuant to the second resolution.

MESSRS. BASSETT, BACON, MILNOR, BLEECKER, WIDGERY, DAWSON, HYNEMAN, ALSTON, and STOW, were appointed the committee, pursuant to the third resolution.

EXPORTATION OF BREADSTUFFS.

Mr. HARPER having stated that he had a motion to make, which, in his opinion, required secrecy, the House was cleared of strangers, and so remained till three o'clock, when the House adjourned, and it appeared that the injunction of secrecy on the proceedings had been removed; and that the motion submitted by Mr. H. was as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, the exportation of flour, and other breadstuffs, from the United States, and the Territories thereof, and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

A question was taken whether the subject-matter of the resolution required secrecy. and passed in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 39, as follows:

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, November 9.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART; from Connecticut, BENJAMIN TALLMADGE; from New York, EBENEZER SAGE, and THOMAS R. GOLD; from Pennsylvania, ROGER DAVIS; from Delaware, HENRY M. RIDGELY; and from Virginia, JOHN TALIAFERRO; appeared and took their seats.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have unanimously resolved that the Rev. JOHN BRECKENRIDGE be appointed Chaplain to Congress, for the present session, on their part.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of sundry owners and agents of privateers in the city of New York, praying for a reduction of the duties on prizes and prize goods; that prize property, on condemnation, may be delivered to them to be disposed of and distributed; that the time necessary to procure condemnations may be shortened; that the fees of the officers of prize courts may be limited to a certain sum, and that prize owners and their agents be authorized to order prizes arrived in one port to any other port, at their discretion, at any time before the actual libelling of such prizes.

Ordered, That so much of the said petition as relates to the revenue, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and that the residue thereof be referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the Naval Establishment, and to the prosecution of the war on the ocean and on the lakes.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements of the application of moneys appropriated for that Department, which have been transferred from one branch of expenditure to another, since the last session of Congress.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to report a bill authorizing the members of the Senate and House of Representatives to frank the President's Message and accompanying documents, transmitted to both Houses of Congress, at the opening of the present session, notwithstanding the same may weigh more than two ounces.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for compensating any person or persons for the unavoidable loss of any horse or horses, during the campaign to Tippecanoe, on the river Wabash, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

EXEMPTION OF SOLDIERS FROM ARREST FOR DEBT.

Mr. BACON stated that, under the present law, exempting from arrest privates in the Army of the United States in certain cases of debt, frauds had been, and more extensively might be, committed; inasmuch as a soldier who was tired of the service, by giving his bond for a feigned debt for an amount greater than twenty dollars, could procure himself to be arrested and kept out of service, &c. Mr. B. further illustrated the evasions to which the present law is liable, and concluded by moving the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for exempting altogether from liability to arrest, or being taken in execution for debt, of any non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, belonging to the Army of the United States, or to any volunteer corps, when called into service pursuant to law.

The resolution was agreed to.

TUESDAY, November 10.

Another member, to wit: from Virginia, JAMES BRECKENRIDGE, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. MITCHILL presented a petition of sundry merchants of the city of New York, praying to be relieved from the penalties incurred by the late importations of British manufactures into the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PLEASANTS presented a petition of Tompkins and Murray, merchants, of Richmond, in the State of Virginia, also praying to be relieved from the penalties incurred by the late importations of British manufactures, on their account, into the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, presented a bill to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day, which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed that a bill had last session passed this House for erecting Mississippi Territory into a State, but been rejected in the Senate from a particular objection, which it was now understood would be soon removed by the consent of the State of Georgia to the measure. He, therefore, proposed that a bill for that purpose should be again originated in this House; and, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and of admitting them into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and that the committee have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to; and Messrs. POINDEXTER, B. HALL, GRUNDY, TALIAFERRO, and GOODWYN, were appointed a committee accordingly.

MOUNTED TROOPS.

Mr. JOHNSON observed that he had draughted a resolution for the consideration of the House, the object of which was to authorize an expedition of mounted volunteers against the several Indian tribes hostile to the United States. He said the people of the United States had the power and the will to break up and to extirpate those hostile savages, to desolate their country, or compel them to surrender at discretion, as the Miamies had done lately when they beheld the strong arm of the Government uplifted and ready to fall upon them heavily. And it was the imperious duty of Congress so to organize this power, and so to direct this will, as to make it effectual and most destructive to the enemy in the line of its operation. Mr. J. said a winter campaign of mounted men well selected, well organized, and well conducted for sixty days, would close an Indian war, which was restrained on their part by no ties of religion, by no rules of morality, by no suggestions of mercy, by no principles of humanity. Sir, said he, you well know that we cannot so guard any part of our extended line of frontier as to prevent entirely the incursions of savages, so long as they have a place of safety or hiding place upon our borders; by reason of which a few desperate savages, well armed with their rifles, tomahawks, and scalping knives, and paid for the scalps of our citizens, may travel in the night, watch their place of assassination undiscovered, and fall upon our infant settlements thus exposed and massacre them without distinction of age or sex, and not leave even an infant to lisp the sad tale of sorrow to the passing stranger. Such has been the fact in many places on our frontier since the battle of Tippecanoe; and such was the melancholy fact near the Ohio river, in Indiana, when upwards of twenty persons were horribly murdered in cold blood, without the opportunity of resistance; the most of these unfortunate victims were women and children, whose heads were roasted by the fire, and in this cruel mode tortured to death, and under circumstances which would blacken and dye with deeper disgrace the most infamous and abandoned set of beings on earth. Since the defeat of Braddock, Mr. J. observed, the conflict with the Indians had always been an unequal one, and the United States had never carried on such a campaign against them as would bring them to their reason. He observed, that a winter campaign of mounted men would place us on an equality in our contest with the Indians; and he pledged himself for the efficacy of such an expedition, if sanctioned and authorized by Congress, and left to the Executive of Kentucky, so far as the forces were taken from that State. On such a campaign they must meet us in battle, or surrender at discretion; they could not avoid our search nor evade our pursuit—the season would furnish certain means of discovery; their strong holds would be broken up; their squaws and children would fall into our hands, and remain sure pledges against savage ferocity and barbarity. Nothing do they so much fear as to have their squaws taken prisoners. Their winter quarters would be discovered and their stock of winter provisions would be destroyed; and once since the revolution the friend to his country would enjoy the satisfaction of seeing our savage enemies humbled in the dust and solely at our mercy, notwithstanding all the arts of British intrigue to the contrary. On the contrary, we want no additional evidence, no train of reasoning, nor a particular detail of facts, to convince us that any other kind of force, and at any other period, will only give us a partial remedy. Upon any other principle we give the savage foe every advantage. When threatened and pursued by a force sufficient to chastise them, no warriors can be found—they scatter through the woods like the wild beasts of the forest. Send a small party, and they are immediately surrounded and cut off by superior numbers. In fact, sir, they will not meet at their own doors and firesides equal numbers in honorable combat—they must always have some great and decided advantage. In the several attacks made upon Fort Wayne, Fort Harrison, and Bellvue—at which places our officers and soldiers acted with a firmness and gallantry deserving the highest praises of their country—the Indians retreated at the approach of assistance, and could not be found. We witnessed the same scene when our army penetrated their country from Fort Wayne, who burnt their towns and destroyed their crops. In short, sir, late in the Spring, in the Summer, and in the Fall, every thicket, every swamp—nay, every brush-heap surrounded with weeds furnishes a hiding place; and it is in vain to search after Indians at such a time, if they are not disposed to be seen. Mr. J. said, with this imperfect picture before us, which, however, contained undeniable facts, Congress could not reconcile it to its duty not to take such steps as would speedily terminate the war with the savages. Such steps had been taken as to produce much temporary distress among the Potawatamies and other tribes, and the destruction of their villages and crops would employ many of their warriors in procuring subsistence for their squaws and children, which consequently gave a correspondent relief to our frontier settlements; that a winter campaign well conducted was indispensable to complete the work which was begun with so much zeal, but which could not produce all the benefit that might be expected from a regular authorized expedition; for it would be recollected that the mounted men had gone out suddenly upon the spur of the occasion, without compensation, with a view to relieve the frontiers from the disasters of Hull's humiliating surrender; and in such voluntary associations many men would consider themselves under less obligations than if employed by the Government, although the party with whom he had the honor to act served beyond the time for which they enrolled themselves, and never quitted the service until honorably discharged. Mr. J. observed, if the savages are unmindful of the many acts of benevolence, of justice and friendship exercised towards them by the United States; if British influence, or British gold, or any other consideration, could induce them to continue the savage practice of imbruing their hands alike in the blood of the warrior in the field, and the infant in its mother's arms; if they will be bound by no obligation however sacred; by no treaty, however solemnly made; by no dictate of nature, no matter how self-evident; the United States are absolved from acts of further forbearance; and we are called upon by every feeling of duty and honor to disarm them of their fury and put them beyond the power of injury. Mr. J. said he had not intended to trouble the House with so many preliminary remarks, but he had seen in his place the Chairman of the committee to whom the resolution was to be referred, and he was anxious that the design and object of the motion should be known, that the committee might act with despatch if it met with their views:

Resolved, That the select committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to military affairs, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing an expedition of mounted volunteers against the Indian tribes hostile to the United States.

The resolution was agreed to nem. con., without debate.

Mr. MILNOR presented a petition of sundry merchants of Boston, also praying to be released from the penalties incurred by them in the late importations, on their account, of British manufactures.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of compelling the judges of the respective districts and territories of the United States to reside within the district or territory for which they may be appointed; and, that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. ORMSBY, Mr. PICKENS, Mr. TALIAFERRO, and Mr. STRONG, were appointed the committee.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. GOLD stated that, in consequence of the great increase of labor devolving on the judges of the district courts of the United States, the salaries of several were altogether inadequate to the services performed, which, in some instances, had tripled since the salaries were fixed, and had become particularly arduous and laborious under recent laws of the United States. Of all the officers in the Government, the compensation allowed to district judges was the lowest in the scale; for, he said, the expenses of travelling the circuit of the districts consumed near the whole emolument of some of the judges, whose salaries were less than many of the clerks in the public offices. Taking these things into view, he was induced to propose the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salaries or compensation allowed by law to the district judges of the several judicial districts within the United States."

The House agreed to consider the resolution; which, however, on the question of its passage, was rejected—yeas 41, nays 42.

THE MINT.

The bill for continuing the Mint of the United States at the city of Philadelphia, was read a third time.

Mr. LEWIS moved to recommit the bill, with a view of substituting Washington City, instead of Philadelphia, for the location of the Mint, urging in support of his proposition the obvious propriety of fixing an establishment of this description at the Seat of the Government which erects it.

Mr. SEYBERT and Mr. SMITH opposed the motion, because a removal would be injurious to the public interest, because of the difficulty of obtaining bullion, except in a great commercial city; and, because it was doubtful whether the officers and workmen who conducted it could be induced to remove from their Philadelphia residence.

The motion was negatived, eight members only rising in favor of it.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed without a division.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. JENNINGS prefaced the following motion by some remarks on its merits. On the extension of the time of payment for lands purchased of the United States, he remarked that the state of things in the Northwestern country, it was evident to every one, had cut off from the people of that country the means whereby they must have calculated to make payment for their lands; and, although the extension of payment was, in principle, objectionable, circumstances now imperiously called for it. On the second resolution, he conceived that, in the end, more money would accrue from it than from the present system, and it would be paid with greater certainty. The following are the resolutions, as proposed by Mr. J.:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of prolonging the time of payment to those purchasers of the public lands northwest of the river Ohio, who shall have purchased prior to the first day of April, 1809.

TUESDAY, November 17.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee appointed on the 13th instant, presented a bill vesting the power of retaliation, in certain cases, in the President of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill vesting the power of retaliation, in certain cases, in the President of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That if any citizen of the United States being a prisoner by land or sea to the British Government, or who has been impressed, has suffered or shall suffer death, mutilation, or other corporeal punishment, or be imprisoned with unusual severity by any officer, agent, soldier, or Indian, in the service of the British Government, the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, empowered and required to cause the most rigorous retaliation to be executed on any subject, officer, soldier, or Indian, in the service or employment of the British Government, as shall or may have been captured by the arms of the United States by land or sea.

LETTERS OF MARQUE, &c.

Mr. BASSETT, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the Naval Establishment, reported, in part, a bill in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all prize property, upon sentence of condemnation, shall, at the request of the owners of the private armed vessel by which the capture shall have been made, or of their agents, be, by the marshal of the district in whose custody the same may be, delivered over to the said owners or their agents, to be by them sold or disposed of at their discretion, and the proceeds thereof distributed by them agreeably to the provisions of law: Provided, That all fees, costs, and charges, arising on the process for condemnation be first paid, and that the duties accruing on such prize goods, as also two per cent. on the estimated value of such prize property, after deducting all duties, costs, and charges, (which value, as it respects the cargo, shall be ascertained in the same manner as is provided by law for ascertaining the value of goods subject to ad valorem duties; and as it respects the vessel, to be ascertained by appraisers to be appointed in the same manner,) shall be first paid, or secured to be paid, to the collector of the district into which such prize property may be brought for condemnation; which two per cent. shall be in lieu of the two per cent. on the net amount of the prize money reserved by the seventh section of the act to which this act is in addition, and shall be pledged and appropriated to the same fund as is thereby provided for.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all bonds taken for the security of the two per cent. fund before provided for shall be made payable within sixty days from the time of taking such bonds.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owners of any private armed vessel or vessels, or their agents, may, at any time before a libel shall be filed against any captured vessel or her cargo, remove the same from any port into which it may be first brought, to any other port in the United States, subject to the same restrictions, and complying with the same regulations, with respect to the payment of duties, which are provided by law in relation to other vessels arriving in port with cargoes subject to duty: Provided, That before such removal the said captured property shall not have been attached at the suit of any adverse claimant, or a claim against the same have been interposed in behalf of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That wherever the proceeds of any prize property has been, or shall be, deposited with the clerk of any district court, pursuant to the orders of said court, upon condemnation, the same shall, at the request of the owners of the private armed vessel by which the capture shall have been made, or of their agents, be paid over to them, to be by them distributed agreeably to the provisions of law.

WEDNESDAY, November 18.

Another member, to wit: JOSIAH QUINCY, from Massachusetts, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. PLEASANTS presented a petition of sundry merchants of Richmond, Virginia, praying to be relieved from the penalties incurred by them in the late importation into the United States of British manufactures.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting copies of a communication from Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State, connected with the correspondence accompanying the Message of the twelfth instant.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, five thousand copies of the Message and documents of the twelfth instant were ordered to be printed for the use of this House.

Another Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting copies of a letter from the Consul General of the United States to Algiers, stating the circumstances preceding and attending his departure from that Regency.—Referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to Foreign Relations.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the expenditure and application of moneys drawn from the Treasury on account of the Navy, for the year ending the first of September, 1812; which was read, and referred to the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to the Naval Establishment.

the President's Message of the 6th instant, presented a bill supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization.

"Be it enacted, &c., That all persons resident in the United States or the Territories thereof on the first of June, 1812, may be admitted to the rights of citizens of the United States, at the times and in the manner prescribed by the acts heretofore passed on that subject, anything arising from or growing out of our present state of war with Great Britain, Ireland, and their dependencies, to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no alien enemy shall be admitted to the rights of citizenship, who shall not within nine months after the passing of this act make his application, and such declaration of his intention, as is required by law. And provided, also, that nothing herein contained shall be taken or construed to interfere or prevent the apprehension and removal, agreeably to law, of any alien enemy at any time previous to the actual naturalization of such alien."

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, &c.; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill vesting the power of retaliation in the President of the United States.

Mr. W. made a speech of some length in favor of the bill.

On motion of Mr. LACOCK, the bill was amended, by inserting after the word "severity," the words "or be otherwise treated contrary to the usages of civilized warfare."

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without debate or opposition.

THURSDAY, November 19.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the Highland Road Turnpike Company, in the State of New York, praying a grant of twenty thousand dollars, to be applied towards completing the said turnpike road; which was read, and referred to a select committee; Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. MAXWELL, and Mr. REED, were appointed the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to military affairs, reported, in part, a bill concerning the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and others, of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

PRIZE LAW.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to the act concerning prizes and prize goods.

Mr. BASSETT, as chairman of the committee who reported the bill, explained its provisions, and enforced the necessity of its adoption. He took occasion to advert to the numerous captures made by our private armed vessels, and their utility as a system of annoyance to the enemy. In every case in which they had come in conflict, they had acquitted themselves in a manner that redounded to their credit.

After some further conversation on the details of the bill, the following section was, on motion of Mr. BACON, substituted for the fourth section of the bill:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in cases of sale of prize property by the marshal of any district, or wherever the proceeds thereof has been or shall be deposited with the clerk of any district court, pursuant to the orders of said court upon condemnation, the same shall, by the said marshal or clerk respectively, at the request of the owners of the private armed vessel by which the capture shall have been made, or of their agents, be paid over to them, to be by them distributed agreeably to the provisions of law: Provided, That all fees, costs, and charges, arising on condemnation be first paid, and all duties accruing on such prize property, as also the two per cent. fund accruing on such proceeds, be first paid, or secured to be paid, to the collector of the district into which such prize may be brought for condemnation, and that the marshal and clerk shall be allowed for their services respectively, in selling, receiving, and paying over as aforesaid, a commission of one per cent. and no more, on the net proceeds of such prize property, after deducting the duties, the two per cent. and charges aforesaid: Provided, also, That such commission shall not exceed, upon any property included in one condemnation, the sum of one thousand dollars."

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RETALIATION.

The engrossed bill "vesting the power of retaliation in the President of the United States in certain cases," was read a third time.

A debate of more than an hour took place on the question of its passage, which was finally determined in the negative, by yeas and nays—51 to 61, as follows:

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of sundry merchants of the city of Philadelphia, praying to be released from the penalties incurred by them in the late importation into the United States of British manufactures, on their accounts.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. POINDESTER, from the committee appointed on the 16th instant, presented a bill concerning the district and territorial judges of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the pay of the Army of the United States, which was read throughout by the Chairman, as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passing of this act, the monthly pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, drivers, bombardiers, matrosses, sappers, miners, artificers, saddlers, farriers, and blacksmiths, who have or shall hereafter enlist in the service of the United States, be as follows, to wit: to each sergeant major and quartermaster-sergeant, — dollars; to each sergeant and teacher of music, — dollars; to each corporal, — dollars; to each musician, — dollars; to each private, driver, bombardier, matross, sapper, and miner, — dollars; to each artificer, saddler, farrier, and blacksmith, — dollars.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, during the continuance of the war with Great Britain, no non-commissioned officer, musician, private, driver, bombardier, matross, sapper, miner, artificer, saddler, farrier, or blacksmith, enlisted in the service of the United States, shall be arrested, or subject to arrest, or to be taken in execution for any debt contracted before or after enlistment.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, during the said war, every person above the age of eighteen years, who shall be enlisted by any officer, shall be held in the Army of the United States during the period of such enlistment; anything in any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, who shall, after the promulgation of this act, be recruited in the regular Army of the United States, may, at his option, to be made at the time of enlistment, engage to serve during the present war with Great Britain, instead of the term of five years; and shall, in case he makes such option, be entitled to the same bounty in money and land, and to all other allowances, and be subject to the same rules and regulations, as if he had enlisted for the term of five years."

Mr. WILLIAMS, as chairman of the committee who reported it, rose to explain the provisions of the bill. He said, he hoped the consideration of the bill would not involve a discussion of the justice or necessity of the war. War, said he, is now declared; we have thrown ourselves between our country and the enemy; and it becomes us to carry her triumphantly through the war, or be responsible for the disgrace a contrary course would incur. The reason of the introduction of the first provision of the bill, he said, was the palpable fact, that the present pay of the Army, taking into consideration the price of labor throughout the Union, was much below the average rate. The committee, in the investigation of this business, had, with much labor, consulted all sources of information accessible to them, and in no part of the United States did it appear to be conceded by their Representatives, that the fair price of labor was less than nine dollars per month. Even if the price was as low as eight, or say seven dollars, wherefore should the soldier receive less than any other man? This is a subject on which every gentleman could decide by recurring to his own neighborhood, and inquiring, what was there the price of labor. If he could not procure the service of an individual there for less than eight dollars, how can he refuse the soldier that price which I now solicit for him? The ranks are not filled; we know it by too melancholy a proof; and it is our duty to fill them. How shall we best do it? It will not be contended that your population is insufficient; no, sir; the inducement is not adequate. There is no avocation of life, no employment, however hazardous, which fails to be pursued from a want of persons ready to engage in it. No, sir; if you want men to scale the mountains of ice under the Northern pole, or endure the fervid rays of a vertical sun in the hither India, to brave the stormy ocean, or search for mines in the bowels of the earth; only find them adequate compensation, and there are men enough to be found. The compensation for services performed, ought always to be in proportion to the risk incurred. This is a position which cannot be controverted. There is no reason why the ranks of your Army are not filled so forcible, as that you do not give enough to the privates. Can you, then, refuse it? Sir, I do not stand here the representative of a claim of a petitioner who wears out the skirts of your Committee of Claims with unceasing importunities—of the man who has neglected the provisions of your law, and asks you to release him from the consequences of his neglect—still less of the man who tramples your law under foot, and now asks to be discharged from the penalty of his transgression—no; I am the advocate of the poor soldier, the man who marches to your Northern and Western boundaries; the man who last night, probably, was beaten up from his quarters to meet the foe; who, the night before, slept in the trenches; and to-night, perhaps, stretches his limbs on the bare ground, with no other covering than the canopy of Heaven, his arms clasped in his hands for your defence—I plead, sir, for the man who has thrown himself between you and the merciless savage, and his still more merciless employer—it is for this poor soldier I ask a little pittance. The whole aggregate of increased pay will be but a mere trifle, compared with the general disbursement for the expenses of the war—it will not increase your expenses much above a million. Whether your ranks be filled or not, the expenditure for the Military Establishment, the ensuing year, will not fall short of ten millions; and yet will you deny one million to make your army efficient? The immense expenses attending your Commissary, Quartermaster, and Ordnance Departments, must be incurred, even though your ranks be not filled—and will you yet hesitate between the additional expense of a million to make your army efficient, and the loss of a disgraced campaign? I cannot but believe, sir, that I am wasting your time and that of the House to no purpose; I will not believe that this will be refused. Mr. W. then briefly adverted to other provisions of the bill. To the second section he apprehended little objection; it had been found to be necessary, and ample precedent might be found for it. To the third section there might and probably would be some objection. It was founded, he said, on the principle that every man owed to the country which protected him, military service; the same principle, already engrafted in our laws, which obliged the youth of eighteen years old to enter into the militia, warranted his retention in the service when he had voluntarily enlisted. The fourth section spoke for itself and needed no explanation.

The second section having been read—

Mr. WHEATON said he conceived this section to involve an infraction of the Constitution. Any person who had contracted a debt had certainly given a pledge, not only of his property, but of his body to his creditor. It is the creditor's right to take his body in default of payment, and the creditor was by this section, in the case of those enlisting in the army, completely taken out of his hands. Ample encouragement, Mr. W. said, might be given to enlistments without infringing the Constitution. He had no objection to privilege the soldier from arrest after enlistment, but he could not consent to the passage of a law, having an ex post facto operation, which went to exempt him from obligations previously contracted. He therefore moved to strike out the words "before or" from the second section above recited.

Mr. BACON spoke in support of this provision. It was necessary to guard against fraud. He said, in the village in which he lived, such frauds had been committed, by the creation of fictitious debts, under which a person enlisting had procured himself to be arrested. After this arrest, on giving bail, he was set at large. Whilst going at liberty, his commander had attempted to take him; but a writ of habeas corpus having been taken out, it had been determined by the courts that a man was the property of his bail until the suit was determined. And that determination, Mr. B. said, would never take place so long as the United States had an occasion for the man's services; because, by the same collusion which commenced it, the suit may be continued from term to term of court, until the term of enlistment has expired. He had merely stated facts. He had known an instance of an officer being obliged to move his whole corps over the line to avoid these petty depredations on their ranks; and he would venture to say that the officers would much rather face the enemy in the field, than the host of legal depredators in Massachusetts, on those enlisted for the public service. The principle of this provision was not novel, he said, for it existed already.

The motion to strike out the section was then negatived by a large majority.

The third section was then read.

Mr. STOW rose and said, that the respect he felt for the House, seemed to forbid that he should propose to them any thing not fully matured; but, that at the same time the objections to one section of the bill under consideration, appeared to him so many and so important, that he could not refrain from urging them, though as he feared in somewhat of an irregular and desultory way. In excuse he said, he had supposed the present bill agreeable to the one reported in the Senate, and had not observed the difference till that moment. His objections were to the 3d section, and which he should close by moving that it be stricken out. He arranged his objections principally under three heads. 1st. Its tendency to violate the public morals. 2d, interference with public economy—and 3d, its violation of the spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

He remarked, that proper instruction and discipline of youth lay at the bottom of all that was valuable in this life, and perhaps of the life to come. That it was of great importance in every Government, but above all that it was infinitely so in ours, where the people were real sovereigns, and where the Government would be ill or well administered, according as the youths were bred in temperance, virtue, and obedience. This section of the bill goes to cut up those qualities by the roots. It says to the uneasy boy in his teens, you may enlist and throw off all parental authority; you may enlist and defraud the parent or master, who has maintained you in your helpless state, of his just reward. The strongest ties of affection and gratitude you may, by enlisting, dissolve in a moment. Nay, more, we say deliberately and solemnly—we will pay this promoted villain $300 for his iniquity! For such is the amount of the bounty and wages for three years. Who, sir, will be most likely to avail himself of this privilege, or rather of this course? Not the sober, faithful minor, who might be trusted in a camp with some degree of safety, but the fickle, turbulent, restless youth, the one of all others who wants the salutary restraint of a parent or guardian. This is the person whom you are about to allow to plunge himself into all the dissipations, into all the seductions, and into all the vices of a camp!

But, sir, said he, it is inhumane, as well as immoral. Humanity calls upon you to take care of and educate the miserable offspring of the poor. Who will take them; who will provide for their infancy, if at the moment they are able to make any remuneration for this humane, this tender care, you offer them $300 to turn ingrate? But, sir, not only the public morals, but the public economy require that you should not enlist minors without the consent of their parents, guardians, or masters. What does public economy require, but that every one should serve the Republic in that capacity in which he can be most useful? And, sir, let me add that patriotism requires the same thing. If the blacksmith or the farmer is most useful in his calling, there is as much patriotism in attending to the anvil and the farm, as to the bayonet and the sword. Men of mature age, by accepting the terms you offer, or not, determine where they can be most useful; but does not every principle of economy forbid that you should go into the private family, the work shops and the manufactory, regardless of the opinion of the father and superintendent, and seduce the young man from learning some useful and honorable employment, and in lieu thereof, at that tender, at that doubtful period of human life, you plunge him into all the immoralities of a camp, and turn him a vagabond on society. No, sir, true economy requires that children should be well educated, well governed, and faithfully bred to some honest calling. The very principle, notwithstanding all the talk of patriotism, is recognised in the price you offer for soldiers, as well by the former law, as by the present bill. You offered by the former law, five dollars per month, by the present bill eight dollars. That is, you say to the world, that by being a soldier, you render to your country services worth five or eight dollars. Now, sir, for five or eight dollars per month is it prudent, is it economical, to dissolve the all-important relation of governor and governed in respect to youth. To break up your infant manufactories? and to deprive poor children at once of an useful employment, and a home? But, sir, perhaps it will be said that necessity, the safety of the Republic, requires this. When the legions of Britain were upon our shores, when we were struggling for our very existence, the necessity was not then thought sufficiently imperious to warrant such a principle. Can it then be said, that with treble the population, and in an offensive war, necessity requires the dangerous innovation? Certainly not. Again, the law, then and now, allows the soldier to be arrested for a debt amounting to two dollars; and will you say, that the debt in which there can be no deception incurred, for the most necessary of all things, food, clothing, and instruction for infancy, shall be disregarded? I trust, sir, that a principle so unreasonable will never prevail. But, lastly, said Mr. S., I do contend that the clause is contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. That Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken without reasonable compensation. The property which a parent has in the services of his son, of a guardian in the services of his ward, and a master in the services of his servant, though differing widely in degree, is as real and oftentimes more important than the farmer has in his personal estates, or the planter in his slave. It also impairs the force of contract, which is strictly interdicted to the States, and a fortiori not to be done to the General Government. For these and for many other reasons which might be added, Mr. S. moved to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said he did not know in what school the gentleman (Mr. Stow) had learnt his ethics; but it appeared to him, his morals were graduated on a scale as weak and deceptive as would, from his observations, appear his patriotism. He (Mr. W.) had been taught to believe the principles of morality were in themselves fixed and settled; unyielding to times and circumstances, and, of course, that which was moral in relation to militia could not be otherwise in the regular army. But the principle of the section rests on still stronger grounds. In the militia, the service of the youth is obtained by coercion, in the regular army by voluntary enlistment. The gentleman has ascribed to me opinions which, he says, I expressed a year ago. He had not flattered himself that any opinion of his could have made so lasting an impression on that gentleman's mind, nor is it material distinctly to recall them to the House, much less could he anticipate such an unfair use would be attempted of any which he may be supposed to have held; but this he certainly remembered, the gentleman himself voted for the employment of militiamen under the age of twenty-one years. To coerce the militia services of a youth, was then quite moral in that gentleman's view; but to accept the voluntary service of the same individual in the regular army is denounced by him, as destructive of public morals and public economy. According to the gentleman, it is altogether moral to extort militia service of the young, to be performed, too, in a mode on which we all agree it is neither safe nor economical wholly to rely, while, to receive his voluntary service in the regular army, at a time of hazard and national extremity, is inhuman and immoral; and yet the gentleman has yielded that the immorality, this crying enormity, (the third section,) may be qualified by necessity! Can it be denied that the necessity is palpable? Can the gentleman wish to see it stronger? Did the affairs of any nation ever call louder for a physical force than do ours? The enemy are on your Western, your Northern, your Southern, and your Eastern frontiers—God only knows where they are not. He was warranted in advocating the section upon the great principle of national necessity and usefulness. In all great crises, individual benefit ought not to preponderate against the public good. Militia services are transient; ought not to be solely depended on, and, as they are released, in that proportion ought your regular forces to be increased. The present provision is intended also to prevent the frauds and impositions practised on your recruiting officers, who are liable to forfeiture and the loss of the bounty paid to any one who may enlist under twenty-one years of age.

NOVEMBER, 1812.

H. OF R.

The gentleman's ideas of patriotism are equally novel and mistaken; he contends that individuals enter the military service of their country with precisely the same object that they become smiths—emolument.

Mr. W. said, he had always considered that patriotism was to be found in sacrifices of individual advantages to the public weal, and not, as is fairly to be inferred from the gentleman, in drawing individual emolument from the public coffers. No, sir; patriotism is not to be purchased, it flows from the heart; it is based on noble principles, and, although soldiers are paid for their services, the great stimulus which carries them into the field, is that love of country which is inseparable from the real patriot. In vain, sir, will the gentleman talk of the increase of our population since the Revolution; it must be much more augmented to produce even a less force than the one contemplated, if that which seems to be his patriotism, shall pervade the nation.

Mr. Stow.—The gentleman is mistaken in supposing I advocated the principle, that minors would make the best soldiers. His principal objection is to the collusions and frauds practised upon officers. He says, if an officer enlists a man under twenty-one, he is liable to lose the bounty. This is true. But does this section remove the difficulty? Are not officers exposed to the same frauds? Suppose you enlist one under eighteen, the age limited by the bill, the result to the officer must be the same—and has an officer any better means of knowing that a recruit is less than eighteen, than that he is less than twenty-one? Sir, if this section is made solely with regard to the protection of officers, it is clear that it does not, and cannot, remove the difficulty.

Mr. MILNOR said that, if he understood the third section of the bill under consideration, it allows recruiting officers to enlist minors above the age of eighteen years, without regard to their situation as apprentices to tradesmen, or living under the care and guardianship of their parents; and its object was to hold out to young minds a temptation to desert the useful course destined for them by their friends, for the purpose of becoming soldiers. Now, said Mr. M., whatever may be the necessity of war, on some occasions, and however necessary some might think that in which we are now engaged, which was a question he should not now meddle with, he was desirous that its operations should be so conducted, as to do as little injury as possible to our fellow-citizens; and, as the leading principle in the conduct of all politicians should be a regard to the public good, he hoped for a general concurrence in this sentiment; that, for his own part, he wished the war to be felt as little as possible in the families and occupations of the people. We are not, said he, to be organized into a military Government. However necessary some may deem this war, all will desire a short one. Thank God, no Napoleon has yet risen up amongst us to change our free institutions into a military despotism. Encourage, if you please, a military spirit, that we may be ready for the national defence, when necessary; but let it be done in the spirit of the Constitution, by means of a well regulated militia; let your citizens and your farmers surrender their apprentices and children to be trained and instructed in military tactics, at stated times, that, when arrived at the state of manhood, they may be ready for their country's service. But what is here proposed? To go into the workshop of the industrious mechanic, or into a parent's dwelling, and entice away, by the lure of money and military glory, the apprentice and the child. No matter what moneys may have been expended in his education, or how great has been parental exertion to advance the future prospects of the child, any recruiting officer, or even a common soldier, profligate in his principles, and inured to vicious habits, is by this bill encouraged to seduce him from his duty. This is not the only bad effect—society, no less than the individual, is interested in his acquisition of a trade, that he may have the means of preventing himself and family from becoming a burden to the community. There is a sufficient proneness to vice in the youthful mind, but this mischievous provision dangerously enlarges the sphere of temptation. Mr. M. said he was particularly alarmed for the city where he resided; that it was already to a very great extent a manufacturing town, and greatly increasing in manufactures. There artisans are very numerous, and many depend almost entirely on their apprentices for the prosecution of their business—to them it was a most injurious measure. Every one knows that boys, of the age you have proposed to make them soldiers, very often become discontented with their situations, they form connexions, and acquire propensities which create a strong desire of release from their master's service; and do you propose to fill your armies by providing these indiscreet young men with the means of legally gratifying their improper inclinations, and thereby do incalculable injury to them, while you lacerate the feelings of their parents, or give a deep wound to the interests of their masters. Viewing this expedient on the score of its general policy, its morality, its justice or humanity, Mr. M. said, he deemed it equally pernicious and unwarrantable. The honorable chairman of the Military Committee had said, that frauds were now practised by pretended allegations of minority, and the bounty paid was in many instances lost. Surely, said Mr. M., this must be the fault of the officer, in yielding too lightly to unsupported suggestions of this sort—

he might, if he pleased, require the fact to be proved in a court of justice on a habeas corpus or other process, instituted for investigating the matter.

Mr. TROUP said, the objections to this provision were lame in their nature; he only wished they were half as sound as they were novel. It was the result of the experience of men older than themselves in military concerns, that this very description of population, between eighteen and twenty-one, constituted the strength and vigor of every war. What was the fact as respected France? So just was this principle in the contemplation of France, that her whole army is made up of these young men; and yet an attempt is made to deter us from using them by a flimsy pretext, that to employ them would be violating the obligations of a contract and the principles of morality. If our feelings and sympathies be suffered to influence us in favor of the individual who voluntarily enlists, the reasons are much stronger in favor of discharging one-half of those already in your ranks, than the description just spoken of. There is scarcely any man over the age of twenty-one years, between whom and other individuals there is not some strong obligatory moral tie, which we ought not to sever if we could conveniently avoid it. Look at the case of a husband deserting his wife and children, or of a man, above twenty-one, deserting his aged parent, dependent on him for subsistence. Are not these cases equally strong? The doctrine of the gentleman, whether on the score of morality or expediency, will apply to cases above as well as below the age of twenty-one. As respects the young men of our country, there is no fact better established than that, at the age of eighteen, they are, as respects physical power, as well qualified for the fatigues of the camp, as in other countries at twenty-one. Their services are more valuable than those of any other class, and he was not willing to dispense with them when we had the greatest occasion for them.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke in favor of the section, but in so low a tone of voice as to be inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. GOLD premised, that he did not rise to enter into the general policy of the war; nor could he deny it to be the duty of those who have declared the war, to provide an army to carry it on. But he added, it is better for the army to be augmented by very liberal bounties and wages, than that important principles should be violated and an inroad made upon the great relations and interests of society. Are gentlemen aware how extensive is the province of master and apprentice? How wide-spread the relation in the community? A sensation will be produced which gentlemen seem not to have anticipated. The respective States have, with studious care, legislated upon and regulated the various duties and obligations of masters and apprentices. Under those laws, a clear obligation is created upon the apprentice to serve till of age; and, in some States, to compensate for absence or desertion during the stipulated apprenticeship; for a faithful performance, the parent or guardian becomes responsible; and for non-performance, liable for damages to the master. Can the authors of this bill imagine that those solemn obligations contained in indentures of apprenticeship, will dissolve and vanish under the charm of the bill? Can the fundamental principles of the Constitution, rendering contracts sacred, be thus uprooted and destroyed? Can this bill deprive the master of his action, secured to him by the laws of the State, against the master or guardian for absence or desertion of the apprentice? Here is a most serious bearing upon the laws of the States, regulating this important relation. But gentlemen allege necessity; the army must be filled up; officers are imposed on by fraudulent minors, who receive the bounty, and then claim a release upon the plea of non-age. In answer, let gentlemen beware how they yield to this fancied plea of necessity. All history attests the danger of yielding essential principles to State necessities; to temporary pressure and impulses; such precedents become infinitely mischievous in society. No fancied benefit can compensate for the evil of such examples. How easy is it to remove much of the complaints by providing that the minor, who shall impose upon the recruiting officer, shall refund the bounty he received before he shall receive his discharge. Such a provision would be just, and not violate general principles. There is certainly no new difficulty in the subject; no new exigency, or unforeseen embarrassment. How far this act will be carried into practice, I cannot say; but the letter of the bill extends to all persons whatever, any former law to the contrary notwithstanding. The provision reaches slaves, who, on enlisting, may be retained by the recruiting officer.

The motion to strike out the third section was negatived.

Mr. LITTLE.—In removing one evil, Mr. Chairman, let us beware that we do not substitute a greater. The object of the section proposed to be stricken out of the bill on your table, and now under consideration, is to fill up the ranks of your army. From every attention I have been able to bestow on this subject, which, permit me to say, I am anxiously desirous, as much so, I trust, as any gentleman in this committee, to see realized, will, if returned in its present shape, in my humble opinion, be productive of much evil, and perhaps but little good. You receive into the army, by voluntary enlistment, that description of our fellow-citizens, at a time of life to them the most interesting and auspicious as respects their future pursuits and welfare. I have always been given to understand that the camp is but illy calculated in those stations which they only can fill in the army, either to improve their understandings or perfect them in such habits as are calculated to acquire a respectable subsistence, or fit them for the domestic duties of their future lives. In the course of nature, they, it may be truly said, constitute the future strength and glory of every country. The laws of this land render every act of theirs illegitimate. Abstract from the consideration of a soldier, for which they are only rendered fit from their corporeal powers, everything with them is premature. If forced into existence, like the flower or fruit unseasonably raised in a hot-bed, wears the external qualities, but, in fragrance and taste, is unnatural and insipid.

Sir, have we not some reason to doubt the constitutionality of this section. In its operation, it evidently will vitiate contracts, which ought always to be held sacred, solemnly and voluntarily entered into by the parent or guardian with the master of an apprentice, reciprocally beneficial, founded on the most laudable and praiseworthy principles, on the faithful performance of which materially depends the future welfare of the youth, to which I believe may reasonably be added the comforts and good order of society. Do we not know, Mr. Chairman, that, at that period of their lives and servitude, in which you make them liable, if this section is retained, to be drawn from the service of their masters, that then, and only then, are they enabled and become qualified to make some remuneration for the pains and attention paid to their improvement and instruction by the worthy and industrious mechanic or manufacturer; and will you, by this unpropitious act, endanger the future happiness of the former, and withhold that just reward due to the industry of the latter? You annihilate this contract, which ought to be held, if possible, inviolate by the Government. Every principle of justice and sound policy dictates its rigid fulfilment. Are we not aware, sir, of the immense sums now invested and actively employed in the different manufactories distributed over our extensive country? Do we not know that the manual labor of them is conducted principally by such who now are, or will in time, come within the provision of this section of your bill? Have this Government, and the people of this country, no interest in the prosperity of these manufactories? I have been always taught, and for one do religiously believe, on their materials virtually depends the completion of our independence as a nation. Let me entreat you to reflect before you hazard this dangerous experiment, lest, in the adoption of this hitherto novel principle, and in its operation, you may endanger the safety, or, at least, the prosperity of our Republic, by giving its manufactories a vital stab.

From the present state of our relations with foreign countries, we are, I may say, happily deprived of their supplies of manufactures, necessary to our convenience and comfort, from abroad; we must at this day depend nearly entirely upon the resources of our country. I thank God that the productions of our native soil, and the genius of our countrymen, are such as will abundantly supply them. Hitherto, the very arms with which our soldiers fight our battles, have been manufactured by our own citizens. And it is said that their clothing will, in a little while, be composed entirely of the domestic. The prosperous situation in which all our manufactories are now placed, will enable them to afford every comfort to both citizen and soldier—if improvidently we do not, by any act of ours, strangle them in their infant efforts. I shall hail the happy day which will bring with it their maturity; which, for the happiness of my country, is not far distant.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) in declaring the necessity of the times, and the right the Government has upon the services of its citizens, has done justice to the dispositions and qualifications of that class of our fellow-citizens. I differ from that gentleman in the idea of those times. They have not yet arrived. When our territory or States shall be invaded, we need no other laws than those which now are in existence, both in the General and State governments. I know it to be the case in that which I have the honor in part to represent. When a draught takes place, and troops are wanted, our laws know no exemption between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years—all are subject to their tour of military duty. When our State is invaded, or threatened to be invaded, the existing laws command the instant service of all. I need urge no arguments to this Committee to show where the distinction exists between this service and a voluntary one in distant war. In the former, when the tour is performed, the survivors return to their farms, their workshops, and homes.

It is not my desire, Mr. Chairman, to prohibit altogether the enlistment of minors, when it can be done without a violation of the rights which a parent, guardian, or master, has over them in governing their actions. I have felt it my duty to give you those reasons, founded on my best judgment, why I cannot vote for this section; and shall now submit an amendment, which I believe supersedes the motion of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STROW.)

Here Mr. L. prepared his amendment, which went to authorize the enlistment of minors with the consent of their parents, guardians, or masters, if any they have.

The motion was declared by the Chairman not to be in order.

Sundry other amendments were proposed in the Committee, after the bill was reported to the House, and negatived. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SATURDAY, November 21.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to military affairs, presented a bill making provision for an additional number of general officers; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. FISK,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the times and places of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States, within, and for, the district of Vermont, and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

NOVEMBER, 1812.

Mr. FISK, Mr. POND, and Mr. HALL, of New Hampshire, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. RHEA,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Naval Establishment be instructed to inquire what amendments, if any, are necessary to be made to the law directing the mode of trial and punishment of offences committed on board of private armed vessels of the United States, and report their opinion thereon, by bill or otherwise.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill "in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," was read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

An engrossed bill "concerning the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and others, of the Army, and for other purposes," was read the third time.

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker, I am sensible that I owe an apology for addressing you at so early a period of the session, and so soon after taking my seat, if not to the House at least to my particular constituents. It is well known to them, at least to very many of them, for I have taken no pains to conceal the intention, that I came to this session of Congress with a settled determination to take no part in the deliberations of the House. I had adopted this resolution, not so much from a sense of self-respect, as of public duty. Seven years' experience in the business of this House, has convinced me that from this side of the House all argument is hopeless; that whatever a majority has determined to do, it will do, in spite of any moral suggestion, or any illustration made in this quarter. Whether it be from the nature of man, or whether it be from the particular provisions of our Constitution, I know not, but the experience of my political life has perfectly convinced me of this fact, that the will of the Cabinet is the law of the land. Under these impressions, I have felt it my duty not to deceive my constituents; and had, therefore, resolved, by no act or expression of mine, in any way, to countenance the belief, that any representation I could make on this floor could be useful to them, or that I could serve them any farther than by a silent vote. Even now, sir, it is not my intention to enter into this discussion. I shall present you my thoughts rather by way of protest than of argument. And I shall not trouble myself afterwards with any cavils that may be made; neither by whom, nor in what manner.

I should not have deviated from the resolution of which I have spoken, were it not for what appears to me the atrocity of the principle, and the magnitude of the mischief, contained in the provisions of this bill. When I speak of the principle as atrocious, I beg distinctly to be understood as not impeaching the motives of any gentleman, or representing them as advocating an atrocious principle. I speak only of the manner in which the object presents itself to my moral view.

It is the principle contained in the third section of the bill of which I speak. That section provides, that "every person above the age of eighteen years, who shall be enlisted by any officer, shall be held in the service of the United States during the period of such enlistment; anything in any act to the contrary notwithstanding." The nature of this provision is apparent, its tendency is not denied. It is to seduce minors of all descriptions, be they wards, apprentices, or children, from the service of their guardians, masters, and parents. On this principle, I rest my objection to the bill. I meddle not with the nature of the war. Nor is it because I am hostile to this war, both in its principle and its conduct, that I at present make any objection to the provisions of the bill. I say nothing against its waste of public money. If eight dollars a month for the private be not enough, take sixteen dollars. If that be not enough, take twenty. Economy is not my difficulty. Nor do I think much of that objection of which my honorable friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) seemed to think a great deal; the liberation of debtors from their obligations. So far as relates to the present argument, without any objection from me, you may take what temptations you please, and apply them to the ordinary haunts for enlistment—clear the jails—exhaust the brothel—make a desert of the tippling shop—lay what snares you please for overgrown vice, for lunacy, which is of full age, and idiocy out of its time.

But here stop. Touch not private right—regard the sacred ties of guardian and master—corrupt not our youth—listen to the necessities of our mechanics and manufacturers—have compassion for the tears of parents.

In order to give a clear view of my subject, I shall consider it under three aspects—its absurdity—its inequality—its immorality.

In remarking on the absurdity of this principle, it is necessary to recur to that part of the Message of the President of the United States at the opening of the present session of Congress, which introduced the objects proposed in this bill to the consideration of the House; and to observe the strange and left-handed conclusions it contains. The paragraph to which I allude is the following:

"With a view to that vigorous prosecution of the war, to which our national faculties are adequate, the attention of Congress will be particularly drawn to the insufficiency of existing provisions, for filling up the Military Establishment. Such is the happy condition of our country, arising from the facility of subsistence and the high wages for every species of occupation, that, notwithstanding the augmented inducements provided at the last session, a partial success only has attended the recruiting service. The deficiency has been necessarily supplied during the campaign, by other than regular troops, with all the inconveniences and expense incident to them. The remedy lies in establishing more favorably for the private soldier, the proportion between his recompense and the term of enlistment. And it is a subject which cannot too soon or too seriously be taken into consideration."

Mr. Speaker—What a picture of felicity has the President of the United States here drawn in describing the situation of the yeomanry of this country? Their condition happy—subsistence easy—wages high—full employ. To such favored beings what would be the suggestions of love, truly parental? Surely that so much happiness should not be put at hazard. That innocence should not be tempted to scenes of guilt. That the prospering ploughshare should not be exchanged for the sword. Such would be the lessons of parental love. And such will always be the lessons which a President of the United States will teach in such a state of things, whenever a father of his country is at the head of the nation. Alas! Mr. Speaker, how different is this Message! The burden of the thought is, how to decoy the happy yeoman from home, from peace, and prosperity, to scenes of blood—how to bait the man-trap: what inducements shall be held forth to avarice, which neither virtue, nor habit, nor wise influences, can resist. But this is not the whole. Our children are to be seduced from their parents. Apprentices are invited to abandon their masters. A legislative sanction is offered to perfidy and treachery. Bounty and wages to filial disobedience. Such are the moral means by which a war, not of defence or of necessity, but of pride and ambition, should be prosecuted. Fit means to such an end.

The absurdity of this bill consists in this: in supposing these provisions to be the remedy for the evil, of which the President complains. The difficulty is, that men cannot be enlisted. The remedy proposed is, more money—and legislative liberty to corrupt our youth. And how is this proved to be a remedy? Why it has been told us, on the other side of the House, that this is the thing they do in France. That the age between eighteen and twenty-one is the best age to make soldiers. That it is the most favorite age, in Bonaparte's conscription. Well, sir, what then? Are we in France? Is Napoleon our king? Or is he the President of the United States? The style in which this example has been urged on the House, recalls to my recollection very strongly a caricature print which was much circulated in the early period of our Revolutionary war. The picture represented America as a hale youth, about eighteen or twenty-one, with a huge purse in his pocket. Lord North, with a pistol at his breast, was saying, "deliver your money." George the Third, pointing at the young man, and, speaking to Lord North, said, "I give you that man's money for my use." Behind the whole group was a Frenchman capering, rubbing his hands for joy, and exclaiming, "Be Gar! just so in France!" Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no manner of doubt, that the day that this act passes, and the whole class of our Northern youth is made subject to the bribes of your recruiting officers, that there will be thousands of Frenchmen in these United States rubbing their hands for joy, and exclaiming, "Be Gar! just so in France." Sir, the great mistake of this whole project lies in this: that French maxims are applied to American States. Now it ought never to be lost sight of by the legislators in this country, that the people of it are not and never can be Frenchmen—and, on the contrary, that they are, and can never be anything else than freemen.

The true source of the absurdity of this bill, is a mistake in the nature of the evil. The President of the United States tells us that the Administration have not sufficient men for their armies. The reason is, he adds, the want of pecuniary motive. In this lies the error. It is not pecuniary motive that is wanting to fill your armies. It is moral motive in which you are deficient. Sir, whatever difference of opinion may exist among the happy and wise yeomanry of New England, in relation to the principle and necessity of this war, there is very little, or at least much less diversity of sentiment, concerning the invasion of Canada, as a means of prosecuting it. They do not want Canada, as an object of ambition; they do not want it as an object of plunder. They see no imaginable connexion between the conquest of that province, and the attainment of those commercial rights which were the pretended objects of the war. On the contrary, they see, and very plainly too, that if our Cabinet be gratified in the object of its ambition, and Canada become a conquered province, that an apology is immediately given, for extending and maintaining in that country a large military force; under pretence of preserving the conquered territories—really, with a view to overawe adjoining States. With this view of that project the yeomanry of New England want that moral motive which will alone, in that country, fill your armies with men worthy enlisting. They have no desire to be the tools of the ambition of any man, or any set of men. Schemes and conquest have no charms for them.

Abandon your projects of invasion; throw your shield over the seaboard and the frontier; awe into silence the Indians in your territory; fortify your cities; take the shackles from your commerce; give us ships and seamen; and show the people of that country a wise object of warfare; and there will be no want of men, money, or spirit.

I proceed to my second objection, which was to the inequality of the operation of the provisions of this bill. It is never to be forgotten, in the conduct of the Government of these United States, that it is a political association of independent sovereignties, greatly differing in respect of wealth, resource, enterprise, extent of territory, and preparation of arms. It ought, also, never to be forgotten, that the proportion of physical force which nature has given does not lie within precisely the same line of division with the proportion of political influence which the Constitution has provided. Now, sir, wise men, conducting a political association thus constructed, ought always to have mainly in view, not to disgust any of the great sections of the country, either in regard of their interests, their habits, or their prejudices. Particularly ought they to be cautious not to burden any of the great sections in a way peculiarly odious to them, and in which the residue of the States cannot be partakers, or at least only in a very small degree. I think this principle of political action is incontrovertible. Now, sir, of all the distinctions which exist in these United States, that which results from the character of the labor in different parts of the country, is the most obvious and critical. In the Southern States, all the laborious industry of the country is conducted by slaves; in the Northern States it is conducted by the yeomanry, their apprentices, or children. The truth is, that the only real property, in the labor of others, which exists in the Northern States, is that which is possessed in that of minors—the very class of which, at its most valuable period, this law proposes to divest them. The planter of the South can look round upon his fifty, his hundred, and his thousand of human beings, and say, These are my property. The farmer of the North has only one or two ewe lambs—his children—of which he can say, and say with pride, like the Roman matron, “These are my ornaments.” Yet these, this bill proposes to take from him, or (what is the same thing) proposes to corrupt them—to bribe them out of his service; and that, too, at the very age when the desire of freedom is the most active, and the splendor of false glory the most enticing. Yet, your slaves are safe; there is no project for their manumission in the bill. The husbandman of the North, the mechanic, the manufacturer, shall have the property he holds in the minors subject to him put to hazard. Your property in the labor of others is safe. Where is the justice—where the equality—of such a provision?

H. OF R.

Pay of the Army.

It is very well known in our country—indeed it is obvious, from the very nature of the thing—that the exact period of life at which the temptation of this law begins to operate upon the minor, is the moment when his services begin to be the most useful to the parent or master. Until the age of 18, the boy has hardly paid to the parent or master the cost of his clothing and education. Between the age of 18 and 20, is just the period of profit to the father and master. It is also the period at which, from the approximation towards manhood, service begins to grow irksome, and the desire of liberty powerful. The passions are then, also, in their most ungoverned sway; and the judgment, not yet ripe, can easily be infatuated and corrupted by the vain dreams of military glory. At this period, your law appears with its instruments of seduction. It offers freedom to the minor's desire of liberty—plunder to his avarice—glory to his weakness. In short, it offers bounty and wages for disobedience to his natural or social obligations. This is a true view of this law. That it will have that full operation which its advocates hope and expect—that it will fill your armies with runaways from their masters and fathers—I do not believe; but, that it will have a very great operation, I know. The temptation to some of our youth will be irresistible. With my consent, they shall never be exposed to it.

I offer another consideration. The Constitution of the United States declares, in its seventh amendment: “Private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation.” Now, of all the property which the laws of the Northern States secure to the people of that country, that which consists in the labor of the minor, and which, by our laws, is sacred to the guardian, master, or parent, is perhaps the most valued and most precious to our manufacturers and yeomen. Yet, when the gentleman from New York (Mr. Stow) proposed to secure the wages and bounty of the enlisting minor to those to whom his service belonged, it was rejected. What is this, but a palpable violation of the provision of the Constitution? What is this, but taking private property for public use, without compensation?

But, neither the pecuniary loss, nor the violation of the Constitution, is the evil which I most deprecate: it is the infringement of our moral rights, and the inroad which the bill makes in the moral habits of our quarter of the country. I know that gentlemen are very apt to sneer, when they hear anything said about our religious institutions or moral habits in the Eastern country. But, I will explain what I mean. It is not our religious institutions—our sabbaths, our fasts, our thanksgivings—nor yet our schools, colleges, and seminaries of education, to which I refer, when I speak of our moral habits. These are but means and precautions. It is certain established principles of life and conduct, which, without being noticed in general laws, are often the foundation of them, and which always rule and control our positive institutions. I do not know, for instance, that the extent of the moral tie, which binds the son to the father, or the apprentice to the master, is precisely defined by any of our laws; yet, the principle upon which all our laws on this subject rests, is this: that this tie is sacred and inviolate. The law regulates, but, except in case of misconduct, never severs it.

I know it is said, that, in our country, minors are subjected to militia duty; and so they are. But, this very service is a proof of the position which I maintain. The obligation to serve in the militia, is always subject to the paramount duty to the master and the parent.

The law says, it is true, that minors shall be subject to militia duty; but it also permits the father and the master to relieve them, at an established price. If either will pay the fine, he may retain the service of the minor, free from the militia duty. What is the consequence of all this? Why, that the minor always trains not free of the will, but subject to the will of his natural or legal guardian. The moral tie is sacred; it is never broken. It is a principle that (cases of misconduct out of the question) the minor shall never conceive himself capable of escaping from the wholesome and wise control of his master or father. The proposed law cuts athwart this wise principle. It preaches infidelity. It makes every recruiting officer in your country an apostle to perfidy. It says to every vain, thoughtless, discontented, or ambitious minor, "Come hither; here is an asylum from your bonds! Here are wages and bounty for disobedience! Only consent to go to Canada—forget what you owe to nature and your protectors—go to Canada, and you shall find freedom and glory!" Such is the morality of this law.

NOVEMBER, 1812.

H. OF R.

Take a slave from his master, on any general and novel principle, and there would be an earthquake from the Potomac to the St Mary's. Bribe an apprentice from his master; seduce a son, worth all the slaves Africa ever produced, from his father, we are told it is only a common affair. It will be right when there is law for it. Such is now the law in France!

Mr. Speaker, I hope what I am now about to say will not be construed into a threat. It is not uttered in that spirit; but only to evince the strength of my convictions concerning the effect of the provisions of this law on the hopes of New England, particularly of Massachusetts. But pass it, and if the Legislatures of the injured States do not come down upon your recruiting officers with the old laws against kidnapping and man-stealing, they are false to themselves, their posterity, and their country.

Mr. Fisk expressed the astonishment he felt at the observations which had fallen from the gentleman last up. He certainly agreed with the gentleman in one thing: that those who are in pursuit of a favorite object frequently overleap the bounds of reason and decorum in support of it. Now, it had been a favorite object with that gentleman to shield the British Government from blame; and it was an object which he certainly pursued with the greatest ardor and anxiety. In the address of that gentleman's political friends, in Congress, to their constituents, subsequent to the declaration of war, it had been deceptively said, that a disposition existed in the British Government to make an arrangement on the subject of impressment. Now, sir, that the ground is taken from under them, we hear that the object of the war is an unrighteous one, and we are guilty of waging it. Is it indeed guilty to defend our country? said Mr. F. The gentleman would overawe the Indians. Sir, the most innocent party in the war against us is the savage himself. How comes he in the ranks against us, with his tomahawk and scalping knife? Why is he impelled to shed our blood? Why has the gentleman shielded British instigation of their outrages?

Again, sir—Has the gentleman no feeling for the sufferings, no ear for the groans of our suffering seamen? Has he no sympathy for those relations of life, from which the seamen is torn away, and for that moral sentiment which is violated in that outrage—and are we guilty because we seek to shield our citizens from it? Are we guilty because we resist the British scalping knife? Recall the year '98 to your recollection, sir, and the pompous display of energy at that day, and the armies raised—to fight whom?—a few miserable Frenchmen whom they could catch at sea. War was then a mere amusement. Why, that we are now at war with the nation which has been seizing our property, capturing our citizens, and carrying them into slavery—why are our means of carrying on war to be limited?

As to the provision of this bill so much objected to, was it esteemed such a violation of all right and principle in the commencement of the Revolution to take children of sixteen years of age from their parents? That was a period when the youth of the country were invited to the field. I was one who accepted the invitation, and I have never regretted it. But, says the gentleman, will you take the child from the parent? Sir, which excites the most tears—a child leaving his parent to defend his country, or a parent torn from his family and his country to fight for a foreign Power? The truth is, that most of those who object to this bill would destroy all the means of carrying on the war, if they could. It was not thought immoral in the war of the Revolution to take youths of this age, nor were they the least efficient part of our army.

But, the gentleman says, the property of a master is thus to be taken from him, and the Constitution guarantees that it shall not be taken. It is the first time I have heard apprentices called property, and they will scarcely thank the gentleman for comparing them to the negroes of the South. The gentleman says we imitate the example of France. He might as well say, we are all Frenchmen because we fight; or that Englishmen are all Frenchmen, for the same reason.

The gentleman speaks of this bill as though its provisions were compulsory. Sir, it contains nothing but an offer to the young men of going into the service of their country, and defending its rights. Had that gentleman retained the pride and feeling of 1776, which has carried us safely through one war, he would not have thought it dishonorable to go out in defence of his country. We have much more cause of war now than we had then. There is no choice between recolonization and war, nor has there been any for a long time. Those who are now disaffected in the East, if they believed Great Britain insisted on the right to impress our citizens, would one and all have drawn the sword on our side. It is because they have been deceived, that they have not done so. It is this cry of French influence which has blinded them. The people of the East are jealous of their rights—and God send they may always remain so. These insinuations, sir, have been a brand of discord thrown among us. It is the division they have excited, and the hope of still greater, which has drawn this war upon us. And yet, sir, what have we been told by the gentleman of our guilt? The arrangement of Erskine, Great Britain refused to ratify; she bribed your citizens to break your laws in a clandestine trade, which is forbidden to the fair and honest merchant. Not a word said against it by the gentleman! And even at this moment, when the sword is drawn, after your men are butchered and roasted—after years of outrage have passed away—the war on our part is called a guilty contest! These sentiments may seem proper to be uttered here; but they are not American sentiments, and the time is approaching when they will not be received in this nation. I tell the gentleman and the world, that such will be the case. I see nothing in the bill objectionable; it contains some provisions absolutely indispensable; and I shall vote for it with pleasure.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said, if it was possible for him to keep down those feelings of indignation which pressed upon his mind, in what he had now to offer, he would speak with due respect to the orders of the House, and not infringe its privileges. He wished, indeed, he had not occasion to speak; but, sir, said he, it is my misfortune to be the Chairman of the Military Committee, more, Mr. Speaker, by your partiality than by any merit of mine. I am compelled to rise. I have been stigmatized by the gentleman (Mr. QUINCY) as the introducer into this House of an atrocious principle: If such language comports with our rules of order, I must submit, seeing it is uttered where he is protected; but, sir, I must pronounce it a libel on myself, and throw it back on him who uttered it, as a foul, atrocious libel on the committee. Sir, I came here not disposed to use such language; nothing but extreme injury should extort it from me. I wish that the gentleman had kept the resolve he informed us he had formed; as he could not do so, I would that he had been good enough to spare me from the acrimony of his remarks. Atrocity! The advocate of an atrocious principle! Let the gentleman recur to those who originated this principle; let him go back to the day of the Revolution, and damn the memory of the patriots of those times, the fruit of whose labors he so ill deserves to enjoy. The provisions of those days authorized the enlistment of all over the age of sixteen years. Nor does the statement which the gentlemen from New York made alter the case, for if there be an increase of population since the Revolution, there appears to be a correspondent deterioration of patriotism. The gentleman from Massachusetts admits that a necessity may exist to justify the course proposed by the bill. Well, sir: was there ever a crisis calling on a people for vigorous exertions more awful than that which impends over us now? Now, when a vile spirit of party has gone abroad and distracted the Union? Now, that the State which the gentleman represents is almost in arms against us? And, in such a state of things are we to be told that we are espousing an atrocious principle, because we are seeking for the means to defend our country? The will of the President is the law of the land, says the gentleman. How can he expect his arguments to be attended to, when the first word he utters after taking his seat is to insult and abuse every one opposed to him in opinion. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, I ask that of the House, for the language I am compelled to use; but so long as I am a man, so help me God, when I am told I am actuated by an atrocious principle, I will throw it back in the teeth of the assertor as an atrocious falsehood. Look back on the principle adopted by the friends of that gentleman—I wish I could say who were his friends—I do not call the honest federalist, who is willing to support his country's rights, his friend—even in England, the nation from which he talks of receiving his religion and morality, and I might add, his ideas of our rights—even in that country they do not prevent enlistment of minors—that is, they are not discharged on the ground of minority. I have said before, sir, that we had examples in our own Government, drawn not to be sure from the purest times, but which more than covered the whole case. A law was passed in 1798 which authorized the enlistment not only of minors but every description of persons whom the President of the United States thought proper to have enlisted—which authorized him to send his recruiting sergeants into every family and take those who suited him best. This was the principle of his friends. Does the gentleman say that it was atrocious in 1798 to defend ourselves against the French? But it has become so now, seeing the defence we seek is against the English. The gentleman has said we act on an absurd principle; that we have mistaken the means of carrying on the war to effect: we want the moral means. By this I presume he would be understood that the people are opposed to the war, particularly to our land operations. There seems then to be no moral objection to the war on the ocean. And, sir, if it be not immoral to support the war on the ocean, on what possible principle can it be immoral, in the same cause, to support it on the land? The war on both elements is for the same object; not, as the gentleman says, to rob and plunder in Canada, but, according to the motto of the gallant Captain Porter, for “free trade and sailors’ rights.” Will the gentleman take time to tell us—when he next draws a comparison between the conduct of the East and the South—what are the Southern motives for urging the prosecution of the war? Will he tell me that I have brothers or friends impressed in the British service? There is scarcely a man from the whole Southern country in that situation. Where do the majority of your sailors come from? From the Southern States or from New England? And will the gentleman tell his constituents, when we are laboring to rescue their connexions, their friends, their children—when we point the bayonet towards Canada, for the protection of their sailors, our only object is robbing and plunder? Sir, we shall be to all intents and purposes colonists, or we must fight ourselves independent. Is there any one principle of colonization which has not been brought to bear on us by the British Government with more rigor than on the island of Jamaica? Colonization has been brought home to the habitation of every man! Does not the gentleman know that the British functionaries have refused to release the friends, the children of his brethren, of his constituents? Is not any argument to the contrary worse than false? Sir, a recreant coward or a treacherous traitor has brought a stain on this country which nothing but physical force, a filling the ranks of your army, can wipe off. To effect this desirable object the bill has been introduced; to which all this strange and violent opposition is made: Is your recruiting officer ordered by this bill into the work shop of the artisan to seduce his apprentices? Is he ordered into the house of your farmers to steal away their sons? No, sir; its object is to prevent collusion and fraud; to prevent depredation, as it has been called, on your ranks. It is sanctioned by precedent; it is enforced by necessity. Under such circumstances individual convenience ought not to preponderate against the general good? We ask not for the sustinment of an atrocious principle, or for the adoption of an immoral law, but for the means to support a just war until we can obtain an honorable peace—as much for the convenience and real benefit of that gentleman and his friends as of any in the House. Sir, I hope the House, notwithstanding the terrible picture which has been attempted of the resentment which will be drawn down on your recruiting officers, will not suffer itself to be influenced, much less frightened, by the gentleman, from the prosecution of its true interest, as at the repeal of the embargo. If you will yield to threats from any quarter, better at once abandon your seats and return to your homes. Let Massachusetts, as the gentleman has threatened, resist the law; I thank God there is yet no point of contact between us, but if she shall, contrary to our mutual interest, array herself against the General Government, I, for one, shall not hesitate to search for the proof that she is only a component part of the Union—not its arbitress.

Mr. WHEATON said, that being now satisfied that the bill would receive the sanction of a majority of the members present, he would not detain the House but for a single moment, in adding to the remarks that had already been made. He regretted extremely that the amendments that had been proposed could not have been received, as without them he could not, in good conscience, give his vote for its becoming a law. He said he had never been an advocate for commencing the war, the difficulties and calamities of which the country now felt, and that were he now to profess a friendship for its continuance, his sincerity might be doubted, at least by some; he had, therefore, no such professions to make; but he presumed it would not be doubted when he declared, that he had no objection to any reasonable remuneration for the services of those unfortunate men who, either voluntarily or by compulsion, had entered the ranks of our armies; and that he did not think the sums, as annexed to the several grades mentioned in the first section of the bill, were, under every equitable consideration, too high. He doubted, however, whether such an increase of pay were the dictate of public policy. Pinching want may give courage and resolution to those whom a fulness would render inactive or disorderly. Besides, as this war must undoubtedly continue at least half a century before any valuable object can probably be obtained by it, it may be worth consideration whether we are not entailing too heavy a burden upon those that are to come after us. Regard is to be had to those that are to pay, as well as to those that are to receive; and it has always been attended with more difficulty to reduce than to raise the wages of those employed in the public service. But to this additional pay, however reasonable in itself, there is another objection, and perhaps more forcible than any; that is, that it is ill-timed. For, said Mr. W., if it be a fact, and that it is, as an honorable man, I am not at liberty to doubt, as it is supported by no less authority than that of the President of the United States, "that the national spirit rises according to the pressure on it, and that the late partial calamities we have experienced have been converted into a source of invigorated efforts, so as to render it necessary to limit rather than to excite the patriotic zeal of the people," would it not be a dictate of prudence to postpone this new encouragement to enlistments to those duller days, we are taught to expect, and which we fondly anticipate; when our arms in the hands of our present soldiers shall be more prosperous, and our success more complete, and when consequently the ardor and patriotism of our people "distinguished by their political stations," shall abate! And further he observed, as applicable to the provision in the bill for freeing those that might enlist from arrests in civil causes, that no justifiable reason could be assigned why one set of men should be thus privileged, and placed in a situation where they might acquire a right in the burying grounds of a foreign country, while another are thereby deprived of their honest dues. He also thought it irreconcilable to conscience in legislators, who are the guardians of the lives, as well as property of the people, when they will not suffer the conveyance of the smallest parcel of property, made by minors, to be valid, to legalize a contract made by such an one, without the solemnities required from persons of full age, in cases much less important, and perhaps entered into in a thoughtless moment, by which, if he should fail in the performance, he might become liable to be shot. On the whole, he said, that if the war were popular, as many gentlemen affirm, it might be well worth a little consideration how far it will go in support of that idea abroad, when it is found that, to carry it on, the Government find it necessary to call to their aid bankrupts without principle, and boys without discretion.

Mr. WIDGERY.—Mr. Speaker: This question has been ably investigated by several gentlemen, especially the gentleman from South Carolina, who is Chairman of the Military Committee. But there are two points stated by the gentleman from Boston, which have not been answered by any one. In one he charges the Government with being under French influence. The other is, that the will of the Executive is the law of the land. And to elucidate his French influence, he gives you a caricature, showing that we acted as in France. I will answer by another—it is of a crowd standing by a shopkeeper's door in London; the shopkeeper, missing a piece of goods, cries stop thief; the thief, finding himself likely to be discovered, rushed through the crowd crying, louder than all the rest, stop thief! This will apply to the gentlemen who are continually crying out French influence, for no other reason but to hide the English influence in our country. This is an artifice which has no foundation. I have often heard of French influence at home, but never could discover where it was; nor have I ever heard of the French Minister of State applauding "his friends in Congress." Where is this French influence to be found? Is it in the runners, with British guineas, from one end of the Union to the other? Sir, there is an old Spanish proverb, that a cover was never big enough to hide itself. The gentlemen are seen through much plainer than they imagine. The gentleman from Massachusetts is very careful to state that he means nothing personal. But when he says the will of the Executive is the law of this nation, is it not a direct reflection on the majority of this House, charging them with a want of independence to discharge their duty as the Representatives of a free people; and whatever gentlemen may say about the people in Massachusetts resisting the officers of Government, I believe no such thing—the people of that State will not commit any overt act against the Government of the United States.

Mr. PITKIN remarked, that the power given to a recruiting officer, to enlist minors, was a new principle. It had not been acted upon before, or since the Revolution—this is a new mode of raising an Army; were gentlemen prepared to adopt this new principle? Although by the resolves of the Congress of 1776, minors could be enlisted, yet apprentices were exempted—and if any were enlisted, yet, on proper application, they were discharged; unless it could be shown the enlistment was with the consent of their masters or guardians. By the law of '98, the President certainly could direct relative to the size and age of a recruit—yet to whom did he apply? Not to apprentices—not to wards;—and then if an officer enlisted an apprentice without the consent of his master, he could be taken away from him by the writ of habeas corpus and the officer held liable for damages. The eleventh section of the law for raising an additional military force contained a similar provision—and it was also necessary, the consent of the master or guardian should be in writing.

Mr. P. did not intend to meddle at all with the policy of war—he should confine himself to the consideration of the most important principle contained in the third section of the bill. The effect of this bill goes to infringe all the State laws. They all provide for the relations which exist between a master and his apprentice—a guardian and his ward; if the apprentice runs away, he can be procured and brought back, and some of the States provide, that when the apprentice comes again into the possession of his master, that he shall serve not only the time lost, but an extra time, to remunerate his master by these services, for the losses he has sustained. If you take away his apprentice you deprive him of his property—this is a loss to the master, or he must recover where the services are due; that is, of the parent or guardian, who are one of the contracting parties to the indentures—and where is the remedy? Will not the officer be also liable to the State laws? Does not the Constitution say, no laws shall be passed abrogating contracts? This bill will in its operation sanction the violation of contracts, or it means nothing—it sanctions the right to take away the property of guardians, parents or masters, without providing any compensation for the same. I repeat, you are introducing a new principle in the mode of administering Government. The pressure is also beyond comparison unequal on the Northern States. Do gentlemen plead the necessity of the case? Does a necessity exist superior to the laws? Are we to understand that the salus populi shall rule without control? If not, then what is meant by this grant to take the property of your constituents, and leave them no remedy for the injury? The honorable gentleman from South Carolina has referred to the practice of other nations. Great Britain herself never incorporated apprentices into her armies.

Mr. WILLIAMS admitted that apprentices were exempt—but minors were not.

Mr. PITKIN agreed, but even when minors are enlisted without the consent of their guardians or masters, they can be released by the writ of habeas corpus. I believe that, in 1756, Great Britain passed an act which was designed to extend to only the colonies; it allowed indentured servants to be enlisted into the army—but this act made provision for the master, if the compensation was claimed within so many months after enlistment, and the necessary facts were proved before any two justices of the peace. Whether this act was ever carried into effect I do not know—but I do know that compensation was provided for the property taken from the master in the person of his servant.

I admit the word apprentice is not directly mentioned in the bill—and I cannot say positively that it is designed to extend to that class of our youth—perhaps not—but as its phraseology is unqualified, and doubts exist, and incalculable trouble may be the result, why not make the law clear and explicit? Is it possible that Congress can, or would seriously contemplate injury to private property? To remove all doubts on this subject and future trouble to the States and this House, the bill should be expressed with all possible clearness and precision. I shall vote for amending the bill by striking out the third section, and on the final question, shall vote against it altogether.

Mr. TROUP.—If a stranger in the gallery had listened to the member from Massachusetts, he would have supposed that the provision of the bill against which the gentleman's anathemas were most vehemently levelled, authorized the recruiting sergeant to enter the house of the citizen, drag from it the young man, and transport him, loaded with chains, (as is said to be the practice of one nation of Europe,) to the armies. Who would have supposed that the provision merely authorized the recruiting sergeant to accept the voluntary service of the young man, between eighteen and twenty-one? The service due to the country, prior in point of time, paramount in obligation, must yield, says the gentleman, to the service due to the master, the parent, or the guardian. If, sir, in the days of Rome's greatness, if in the proud days of Grecian glory, the man could have been found base and hardy enough to withhold the young men from the public service, to turn them from the path of honor, or to restrain them from the field of fame, he would have been hurled from the Tarpeian Rock or consigned to the Cave of Trophonius. The young man is preferred here, not because he is preferred in France, but because his physical constitution and his moral temperament peculiarly qualify him for the arduous duties of the field and camp; bodily vigor and activity, ardor, enterprise, impetuosity; without family, and therefore without the cares which family involve. No wife, no helpless children. Without care, but for his country. Without fear, but for her dishonor. He is most eminently qualified for the duties of the camp and the field; all experience has proved it. But the gentleman is not content with opposing himself to the patriotism of the young men; he is not less opposed to the increase of pay. Mr. T. thought, from the conduct of the House the other day, that the provision had been universally approved. He was the more surprised at the opposition of the gentleman, because it was this provision of the bill which went to eradicate that vice and immorality of the Army, which the gentleman affected so much to deplore. The increase of pay had two objects, the filling the ranks, and the general respectability of the Army. The recruiting service had suddenly stopped; it stopped only because all the men which were to be had for sixteen dollars bounty, and five dollars and one hundred and sixty acres of land, were already picked up; to get more, nothing could be done but to increase the pay; the quantum of increase was the only question. The difficulty of enlisting men was not peculiar to us; it was felt by every nation. Military wages bore no equitable proportion to the ordinary wages of the country. In the stronger and more despotic Governments of Europe force was resorted to; in the more mild and moderate, stratagem and fraud and trick. Who had not heard of the tricks of recruiting sergeants? Under our own Government, enlistments, to be lawful, must be fair and free and voluntary; hence, the only remedy left us was increase of pay. But the filling of the ranks was by no means the most important object. The increase of the general respectability of the Army was of infinitely more importance. The regular service had been brought into universal disrepute in the country. The cause is obvious; it was the five dollars per month, and nothing else. There was nothing ignominious or disgraceful in the nature of the employment;

on the contrary, it is honorable, it inspires honorable sentiments. Ask the farmer why he does not encourage his son to enlist in the service of his country? He answers at once, that he can make ten dollars a month on the farm; that if he has honesty and industry anybody will hire him for ten dollars. Can there be any doubt that, by increasing the pay, you will increase the numbers of the Army? not only so, in the exact proportion as you increase the pay, will you increase the respectability. It is self-evident. Suppose, instead of sixty dollars, or ninety dollars a year, you would agree to give them five thousand dollars, there is no doubt your ranks would soon be filled. You would have the silk-stocking gentry, (I do not know that the Army would be much better for that,) you would chance to have a few members of Congress, perhaps a Secretary of State, perhaps an ex-President; you would at least enlist honesty and industry. I say, sir, the increase of the respectability of the Army at this moment is of infinite importance. With every disposition to rely on the militia for defence and offence, we are not permitted to do so; the militia are withheld by some of the States. The gentleman and his friends have withheld the militia of Massachusetts; he would now withhold the regulars. Give character and respectability to the Army, and when in a spirit of jealousy or disaffection, or treason, the militia should be withheld, you are still independent; you are still a Government for all the objects of Government. If Massachusetts and Connecticut—but I forbear!

Mr. Macon said, it appeared the House was now in a situation in which it had frequently been heretofore; that is, they take up a very small subject and make a very great one of it. The only question for discussion appeared to him to be, whether or not they would enlist into the Army young men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one. He was very sorry that, at this early period of the session, a discussion had been introduced into the House, which had at all times better be let alone, that of foreign influence. He did not mean to discuss it; but, if gentlemen were anxious for it, he was perfectly willing to set aside a day for the consideration of the subject, and go about it methodically. He regretted very much that the feature to which he had alluded had been inserted in the bill; because he had been in hopes that, on the question of raising the pay of the Army, they would, one and all, have manifested a disposition to support the rights of the country. In the hope that they would yet come to an agreement on the subject; that they could give some vote of unanimity in relation to the war, he should move for a recommitment of the bill, with a view to amend it by striking out the third section. It appeared to him that, until a man had acquired political rights, he ought not to be called on to defend his country. The gentleman from South Carolina says the principle of this section already exists in our militia laws. I admit it; and hence, I have always, when our militia laws have been under consideration, moved to strike out "eighteen" and insert "twenty-one." I hope, if we do not take recruits under twenty-one, we will alter the militia laws also, and let the country rely for its defence on those who manage its concerns. He hoped the House would consent to recommit the bill, and, in some one vote, show something like unanimity.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to speak at the same moment with Mr. MACON, who, however, being first seen by the SPEAKER, obtained the floor.

Mr. R. said that, he was extremely happy, as he did not notice his friend from North Carolina, at the time of his rising—in which case he should certainly have given way to him according to custom—that he had caught the Speaker's eye first. I was about to rise, said Mr. R., for the purpose of making a similar motion; and there are considerations on which it is unnecessary for me to dwell, and towards which I will not even hint, that render it at least as agreeable to me that the motion for recommitment should come from that respectable and weighty quarter, rather than from myself. I shall vote for it upon the same grounds which would have induced me ultimately to vote against the bill; because it contains provisions, I might say principles, unsusceptible of modification, and, in my judgment, hostile to all those principles which I have hitherto entertained, and to which it is impossible for me to give the sanction of my support. I shall not vote against the bill, for some of the reasons urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts on my right, (Mr. QUINCY,) with more of eloquence than temperance, and answered in a style not dissimilar by my worthy friend on my left, (Mr. WILLIAMS.) They both reminded me of a stroke of perhaps the only comic poet this country has produced:

"The more they injured their side,
The more argument they applied."

The gentleman from Massachusetts touched a chord, which, he ought to have known, was that which would insure the passage of this bill; which would excite a temper that would indispose the House to listen to the still small voice of conscience and of reason. I, sir, shall vote for the recommitment of this bill, and for reasons which, I am almost ashamed to urge; which I hope to be excused for adducing. They have nothing to do with the question of impressment, of maritime war, of the invasion of Canada, of Indian warfare; but, sir, they are principles which, from length of time, I am sorry to say, have grown so obsolete, like some of the older statutes of those countries of more ancient date than ourselves, that, though I am not ashamed of them, I am almost ashamed to mention them—they are those professed by the Republican party in the year 1798, which I had the honor of attempting, at least, to support in those days—the principles, as reduced to record, of the present Chief Magistrate of our country in those days. In truth, it has been insinuated, if not asserted, with much more of candor than of logical address, that the principles of the bill are those of the former friends of the gentleman from Massachusetts on my left, from which, I suppose, that gentleman has, in some way or other, deserted. This goes to prove, as far as the authority of the gentleman from Vermont and of my worthy friend from South Carolina has influence, that a long course of opposition has instilled into the gentleman something of the principles which did not belong to his friends while in power; that he is a deserter from his party, and consequently that I have remained a faithful sentinel at my post. I did not expect to hear it said, sir, that this bill was not to be opposed because a similar bill had been passed in what used to be called the Reign of Terror. In other words, I did not expect to hear it stated that the principles of the Administration of the predecessor of Jefferson, which, I suppose, he would now be as ready to recant as any man in the nation, justified the bill; that it ought to be passed, because it was fashioned in conformity to such doctrines. It is now, sir, I think, some thirteen or fourteen years ago, since a similar question was agitated on the floor of this House, and it was my lot to be compelled to sustain the same side of the question which I sustain to-day—for I will not use the qualified term, attempt to sustain, against one of the proudest names in this country—against the man who now presides, I will not say with what splendor of abilities, at the head of the judicial department of our Government. The House will readily agree that, plain must have been that question which could have been supported with such unequal odds; that strong must have been that side of the argument against such an advocate. It was one of those occasions on which the gentleman who then presided in the House declared "he never witnessed a more unpromising debate:" it was so—for it was one of those which tended to put that gentleman and his friends into the situation which so many of them—I will not say all—for there are some illustrious examples to the contrary—into the situation which many of them have since occupied. It was an assertion of the great fundamental principles of our Government against arbitrary, high-toned courtly notions. The party then in power had been nearly as long in office as the party now in power, and looked at the question pending before them, with a very different eye, while they wielded the sceptre, than that with which they look at the question now, when the sceptre is applied to their backs. I am sorry to say that I fear that the converse of the proposition is, in a great degree, true, and that those principles which I then supported, and which were the ground of the revolution of political sentiment in 1801 which thereafter ensued, have fallen, as it were, in abeyance; that, in fact, we have forgotten our oracle.

I have said, on a former occasion, and if I were Philip, I would employ a man to say it every day, that the people of this country, if ever they lose their liberties, will do it by sacrificing some great principle of free government to temporary passion. There are certain great principles, which if they be not held inviolate at all seasons, our liberty is gone. If we give them up, it is perfectly immaterial what is the character of our

H. OF R.

Sovereign; whether he be King or President, elective or hereditary—it is perfectly immaterial what is his character—we shall be slaves—it is not an elective government which will preserve us.

But I am afraid I have fallen somewhat into error, by wandering from the course I proposed. On the occasion to which I have alluded, I maintained that the provision of a bill then pending, similar to that I now object to, was arbitrary, unconstitutional, and unjust, because it was in the nature of an ex post facto law. It is of the nature of an ex post facto law—it is more—it tends to exalt the military authority over the civil—it is this or it is nothing. If the section pronounce an ambiguous voice, to be construed according to expediency, then is there so much greater reason to recommit the bill, to reduce it to some shape which shall render it intelligible to the meanest capacity. It goes to alter the nature of a remedy—to impair the obligation of a contract. A man has contracted a debt, and his creditors arrest him. He enlists. He enlists through the grates of a prison or within the limits of prison bounds. The contract between this man and the creditor is varied by the law, because the remedy of the creditor is changed. Let us not have a descant on the cruelty of imprisonment for debt, and the expediency of introducing other provisions on that subject. That is not the question. It is on a law for exempting a particular class of men from those penalties and provisions which attach to all other classes of society. The military of all classes in society, that class which we are about to exempt from the general provisions attaching to other classes, is that of which the people of this country have been led by all our writers, by all our authorities, to entertain the most watchful and justly founded jealousy. It is on principles somewhat analogous to these, or rather the same, much better enforced, that an opposition was maintained to a law, not dissimilar in its provisions from this, in the winter of 1799–1800.

In the fury and tempest of his passion, my friend from South Carolina seemed to overlook, what I thought he would be one of the last to forget, that we live in a limited Government, possessing restricted powers, which we cannot exceed. Has the Constitution, with the most jealous scrutiny, defined the privileges of a member of this House, not permitting us to define our own, and made our principal privilege an exemption from arrest; and do we clothe ourselves with the power of exempting from arrest, ad libitum, a whole class of society—of creating a privileged order? We are, indeed, a privileged order, but we are privileged by the Constitution. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina whence he derives the power of creating a privileged order, and shall this assumption of power be attempted in favor of the military, of all other classes? In my opinion, sir, the section to which I have had reference is freighted with most fatal consequences. I will suppose a case. Suppose a man had a writ served upon him, and he afterwards enlists; that an escape warrant is taken out against him, and a contest ensues between the recruiting sergeant and the civil officer for this man, and, that the civil authority supports its officer by calling out the force at its disposal. What would be the upshot? What is it to lead to? I need not state the consequences. These principles, sir, were urged thirteen years ago; they are urged now, in the same place, and on the same occasion. I cannot consent, in deference to any gentlemen, however great their zeal, to admit that I merely urged them at that time, from party views, to put down one description of persons in order to get into their warm berths. I cannot consent to such an admission, and, therefore, cannot give my support to any bill which contains such provisions. I have said this will be an ex post facto law. It is so; it operates not only after the right has accrued to the creditor to sue out his writ, but after it is in a course of execution. Let me put another case. Suppose that Congress were to pass a law that every malefactor under the sentence of death, who enlisted in the Army, should not have the sentence of the law executed on his body. Have you not as good a right to do that as to pass this law? Would you consent to see a scuffle at the gallows between the civil authority and the military for the body of that wretch?

I will put another case, sir. A son, who is the only support of a widowed and aged mother, in some moment of hilarity, perhaps of intoxication, led astray by the phantom Glory, enlists in the Army of the United States. I speak of one who is a minor. Although I know that freemen of this country cannot be property in the sense in which a slave is property, yet, I do allow that the mother has a property in the time of that child; that he is under an obligation from which no human law can absolve him—an obligation imposed upon him by the maternal throes that issued him into life—by the nourishment drawn from the parent's breast—by the cherishing hand which fostered him through imbecility and infancy. You have not a right to take him—I hope then, sir, that no question will be made of your power.

I put another case, said Mr. R. Although an apprentice and a minor are not property in the sense in which a slave is property, there is a class of men, unluckily, in certain parts of our country (in Philadelphia, for instance—I mean that class called “redemptioners,”) who were sold but yesterday in the markets of that city. Is the gentleman who represents that district (Mr. SEYBERT) willing that they shall absolve themselves from their contract by enlisting in the Army? If he is, I am. A redemptioner, sold in Philadelphia for a term of years, bought in the market as fairly as any other commodity—(I say fairly, because bought with his own consent, and as he believes, for his own advantage)—such a person, if tempted to enlist, will, unquestionably, prefer the pay and emolument of a soldier in your Army to his present situation. With regard to apprentices, I very much fear, sir, that those who enlist will, for the greater part, be of that description for whom their masters have advertised six cents reward, and forewarned all persons from harboring them. I remember, when a small boy, to have seen a series of prints by Hogarth, called "The Progress of Industry and Idleness." The gradations were not more regular than natural. The one ends with wealth, honor, and an eligible matrimonial connexion with the daughter of his master, with whom he had been admitted into partnership; the other is brought up by the gibbet. Their names were Thomas Idle and William Goodchild. I believe, sir, that more of the Thomas Idles than of any other will enlist under this law, and I sincerely hope they will; for I very much fear that even William Goodchild, after he has gone through the discipline of a camp for five years, will be utterly unfit for any other species of employment. This is not all. There are other considerations, which I forbear to touch—which, I should have supposed, would have brought themselves home to the bosom of every gentleman in this House. Personal indisposition has prevented my attendance in this House, and I did not hear of this bill until last night. It was then mentioned to me by one who is fast in the old faith, and has often brought the House to a recollection of good old principles; and I did hope that they would this day have received more strenuous aid from that quarter than they have. I hope the House will refuse to pass the bill, if it were only to show that there is some one act of the Administration of 1799–1800, which the present possessors of power have not copied from their statute book. There remains only this, and the eight per cent. stock loan—and we are saved from the latter only by the infractions of that law, which we imperiously refused at the last session to repeal. It is the infractions of this law, which has poured money into our coffers, and saved us from the disgrace of an eight per cent. loan. There is another part of this bill which strikes me as being inexpedient; but, as I do not wish to blend considerations of expediency with those of great and vital principles, I shall waive anything on that head.

I am of opinion, when called into actual service of the United States, the militia ought to receive better pay than that allowed by law; because many of them are in such a situation that their families are dependent on their personal services for subsistence; and it is not possible that, at the present rate of pay, anything can be spared by the soldier for his family at home. In one respect, I think my worthy friend from North Carolina has indulged rather in curious speculations than sound practice, when he would refuse to avail himself of the services of a man because he has no participation in the Government. Would he also disfranchise those who had passed the period of liability to militia duty? I know he would not. But if there be truth in his position, that no man should be called to perform military duty who has no agency in the Government, it would follow that no man should have an agency in Government who is not called on by it to perform military duty.

Whether, as respects the regular Army, enlistments are to be procured more readily by an increase of pay or bounty, I leave to those more skilled in military affairs than myself to determine. But it strikes me that it is not by an increase of pay that you will obtain any addition to the number of recruits. Those who enlist in the Army do it not with a view to the pay, but to the bounty. Take away that, and I venture to say you may treble the pay and you will hardly get men to enlist. I am confident you would not if you doubled the pay. How far it is politic in a Government like that of the United States to cherish military establishments by high bounties, will properly be a subject of discussion when the bill is recommitted to a Committee of the whole House, as I trust it will be; but it always has appeared to me that if you wish to perpetuate any establishment—to rivet it on a nation—you ought to make it as "respectable" and lucrative as possible. What is the reason that any particular class or profession in society has held its ground against all opposition? It has been the respectability of the calling—the lucrativeness of it. If you could never get rid of the Army when it was neither lucrative nor respectable, do you expect ever to get rid of it when it is more lucrative and respectable—when the whole youth of the country is embodied in it, and there is scarcely a family in the country that has not an interest in keeping it up? My eyes were caught last night by a paragraph in a newspaper announcing the trial of a deserter. It was there stated that the practice had become so common as to endanger the safety of the nation. Will that practice be diminished by an increase of the pay of the soldiers? The man, who was condemned to death was one who had repeatedly enlisted, for the purpose, probably, of obtaining the bounty. When, in the Roman Republic—and we have been taught by my friend on the right to refer to them—the army became not only a part, but the whole of the constitution, was the army ever affected, in point of number or power, by the immense donatives, the vast increase of pay and bounty, given by the Emperors? From the moment you make the Army what I see gentlemen desirous of making it, the great lucrative and respectable profession of the country; when you thin the ranks of law and of medicine—and in that respect, perhaps, save human life, if not human blood—we have a new order of society, a new Constitution.

Mr. R. then adverted to the last section of the bill. He owned it was with some unpleasant feelings he saw this provision for commutation of service from a five years' enlistment to enlistment during the war. But it was highly possible that upon this as well as other topics, on which he had incidentally and very digressively touched, the House has heard objections and arguments similar to those he had used, and infinitely more worthy their attention.

Before he sat down, Mr. R. said he must be permitted to remark, that although he should not, as he intended, from the lateness of the hour of the day, go very far into the book of Chronicles, the Records of 1799—he must be permitted, and the House would excuse him for it, to speak in reference to transactions of the last session, on the subject of Indian savages, who had been brought up in this day's debate. The House may not have troubled its recollection, said he, with the declaration on this subject at that day made by me, and which, however inconsiderately made, I still adhere to. The power of the Indian savages within the limits of the United States, with whom we were in any danger of coming into collision, was broken by the same arm which broke the fetters of British dominion. The Peace of Greenville, which followed Wayne's Indian war, put an end to all collision between us and those barbarians; and there never was, from that time up to the transaction at Tippecanoe, any interruption of our ascendancy over them. When the present President of the United States came into power, Mr. R. said, he had announced the pacific disposition of the Indian tribes, who were generally linked together in the Message with the Barbarian Powers of Europe. This declaration of their pacific disposition had been reiterated in each Message until that of the last session, as Mr. R. proved by quotations which he read. In the Message at the opening of the preceding session, which Mr. R. denominated the penultimate session, their pacific disposition was distinctly stated. These continued declarations, he said, were conclusive on the subject of Indians and of Indian warfare.

In my desultory way, continued Mr. R., I will make another remark, as to the pay of soldiers. I had always understood that in an army it was the policy of the officers to keep the soldiery poor—I beg to be understood as speaking of regulars only—that as long as the men were flushed with money, they made by so much the worse soldiers—that their fitness and utility as soldiers was in the inverse proportion to the goodness of their finances.

With respect to the examples of ancient Commonwealths, it must be obvious to gentlemen much less well read in them than the gentleman from Georgia who has alluded to them, that there is no analogy in the cases he cited; that their Governments were anomalous, having no fixed principles, nothing that we should call civil or rational liberty—that they were ignorant of the liberty of conscience—that they had not representative Government. How then can there be any analogy between them and ourselves, who sit here under a specific and limited authority? None I believe can be pointed out.

It appears to me, sir, if this bill be not recommended, and do not undergo alteration, it will endanger collisions of authority between the State and Federal Government. I would ask by what right can the Federal Government undertake to dispense with the law of a State in a case of contract between two citizens of the same State? I would ask, with deference and submission, whether the State courts will feel themselves bound by this law. In some States they may; but in a majority of the States I trust they will not. And, notwithstanding what the gentleman from South Carolina has said on the subject of the conduct of Massachusetts, it is a matter of notoriety that the opposition of Virginia and Kentucky did put an end to Mr. Adams's war. We took our stand, sir, and, on principles for which I have been attempting this day most feebly to contend, we triumphed. The patriotism and good sense of the American people ratified what we did. If you doubt it, look to the authority. At a session of the Virginia Legislature in 1799 certain resolutions were passed which produced nearly the same language on this floor in relation to her as we have to-day heard from the gentleman from South Carolina. They would not be dragged into the measures of the then Administration. These resolutions of Virginia began in other States intemperate resolves in favor of the war with France, and vituperative language respecting the conduct of Virginia and Kentucky. These resolves were, at the session of the Virginia Assembly ensuing, committed to a committee of which the present Chief Magistrate was chairman, and a report was draughted by him in support of the ground then taken in the States of Virginia and Kentucky. Mr. R. then quoted some of these resolutions, in which the Legislature deprecate the war with France as unnecessary, and recommend that, instead of expending money on needless armies and navies, the Government should husband the public resources, &c. So that, said Mr. R., according to the doctrines of that day, as laid down from an authority not less then respected by those out of power than now by those in power, the true policy of this country was—to do what? Not to raise volunteer or military corps, not to lavish your funds on regular armies, but “to husband the public resources.” I shall, said Mr. R., in conclusion, go no farther, but content myself with having proved that I am an irreclaimable heretic—that I will not, for the sake of expediency, give up principles and opinions with which I came into public life—that if I am wrong now, it has been my misfortune to have been so for fourteen years—and at least for one period of my life, that I had the fortune of erring with Plato rather than being right with other people.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he stood reproved, but not corrected, by the gentleman who had just sat down. I was charged, sir, said Mr. W., with advocating an atrocious principle, and I throw back the aspersions on him who made it—I am much mistaken in the character of the gentleman from Virginia, if he would not have done the same with as much “fury” at least as I could. I stand then reproved, sir, but not corrected. I have advocated the provision of this bill most objected to, for three reasons; that it is sanctioned by the usage of other countries and of our own; that it is founded on the same principle which runs through all our laws, that the service of the citizen is due to the nation which protects him and in the Government of which he participates; and that it is particularly called for by the exigencies of the times. These reasons have not been met. Until they are rebutted, I must support it. On this occasion, at least, it cannot be alleged that arguments addressed by members on the other side of the House have no effect on this; for no argument has been used in reply to those which have been advanced in its favor.

With respect to "dragooning" Massachusetts, sir, I feel no more disposition to do it than that gentleman; I believe he would shrink with as much intrinsic abhorrence from measures openly advocated in that country, as I would. Her leaders dare not tell the people that they refuse to grant their physical force to support the country's independence—to save it from British domination. The gentleman from Massachusetts did not say so. They writhe under the lash, but dare not defend their conduct. There is no point of contact between her and the Union—God forbid there should be!—but if there should be, I would be one that would teach her to know her duty. Is the opposition of Virginia in the days of terror, to be compared to that of the present rulers of Massachusetts? The opposition of the one was Constitutional—that of the other is not. Yes, sir, I do hope that the authority of the Union and of that State may never come in contact, that we may not be under the necessity of putting down the desperate measures of that State. Sir, when we are insulted, when we are "dragooned" for endeavoring to put our country in the armor the times call for, when an attempt is made to deprive us of the means of defence; I, for one, will not refrain from expressing my sentiments of such conduct and of the remedy for it.

Mr. BIGELOW rose, he said, not to enter into this discussion, but to express his regret that any remarks had been introduced into debate irrelevant to the subject, and particularly in relation to the conduct of Massachusetts. He was sorry to hear the gentleman from South Carolina say that the Representatives from that State writhed under the lash, but dare not defend the conduct of their Executive. When the subject should come properly before the House, the gentleman would find them not loth to enter into debate and to defend the conduct of the authorities of the State in the case alluded to. He had risen, he said, for no other purpose but to give this intimation.

Mr. JOHNSON said, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had made it his duty to trouble the House with a few remarks. Mr. J. said the House would recollect that at the last session he advanced the position, and indeed had stated that there was satisfactory evidence to prove, that the Indian tribes hostile to the United States had been stimulated by British gold or British influence, or the local authorities in Canada acting under the sanction of the British Government, to take up arms against the people of this country, and to murder unarmed and defenceless individuals on our frontiers. The House will recollect that this fact was either denied or considered problematical by the gentleman from Virginia; who at the same time gave a pledge, that could he believe that such was the fact, he would not only vote for a declaration of war against Britain, but he would march himself with him (Mr. J.) to Canada, to take possession of that country: that on the present occasion the same fact was denied, and the same pledge renewed, and a Message from the President, of 1810, had been read to prove the friendly dispositions of the Indians and to deny the fact of their hostility. Mr. J. said, he asked the gentleman whether he denied the hostility of many tribes of Indians to the United States? Would he deny the fact that the savages were employed by General Brock at Detroit and at Queenstown? Would he deny that the savages were now in the employ of Great Britain in Canada, clothed, fed and paid? Would he deny what was admitted by official communications from British officers, and what was seen by our countrymen in arms? Would he deny that after the surrender of Detroit, Fort Wayne was attacked and invested by the same tribe of Indians that is now in British pay and British influence, and that two hundred British regulars and Canadians together with about one thousand savages had traversed a wilderness of one hundred and fifty miles from Malden until they reached within thirty miles of Fort Wayne, with cannon to aid in the attack upon that place; but who were fortunately driven away and compelled to retreat by the left wing of the Northwest army? Would he deny that the Indians fought against us, and by the side of British regulars, near Brownstown, where they were defeated by the valor of our troops? Would he deny that the same hostile savages had fallen upon our frontier after the surrender of Hull, committing their barbarities until checked by the forces from Kentucky and Ohio? Mr. J. said it was no longer a matter of opinion or belief, but a notorious positive fact—where then, he required, was the promise of co-operation? Where was the pledge that had been given—or was it supposed that the British were now justified in employing the savages to murder defenceless women and children, or to employ them in a contest between civilized nations? Mr. J. said he had not been unmindful of the pledge which had been given—he thought of it when he was in pursuit of the savages in company with brave and patriotic men. He should have been much gratified to have had the gentlemen from Virginia by his side, not only in the pursuit, but he would have been more gratified to have found the enemy.

Mr. J. said he did not feel disposed to pursue the gentleman from Virginia in other remarks which he had made. The gentleman had enumerated principles which, in his opinion, would at some period destroy the Republic. Mr. J. said the liberties of the people and the cause of the Republic would be much more likely in his opinion to be jeopardized if the gentleman was to succeed in his opposition to a war, which was not only just on our part, but one which could not be avoided.

The gentleman from Virginia had spoken of his own consistency and his standing at his post as a faithful sentinel; which was all admissible. But, not satisfied with this declaration, the Federal gentlemen were represented as having changed from the high-toned measures and principles in the Reign of Terror and become advocates of independence and freedom—and that, of the Republicans in this House, the majority had abandoned their old Whig principles. Mr. J. observed, that if the day was not almost gone, and the patience of the House exhausted, he should feel it his duty to resort to the records, the Journal of the House, and examine the correctness of the ground which had been assumed, but not maintained, as to the consistency of gentlemen. For his part, (Mr. J. said) he should content himself with saying he believed the majority were supporting the great cause of the country, of independence and freedom, and that an opposite course had an opposite tendency.

The question was then taken on the motion to recommit the bill, and lost. For recommitment 42, against it 62.

The question was then taken that the said bill do pass; and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 37, as follows:

MONDAY November 23.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to prohibit the use of licenses, or papers, issued under the authority of any foreign Government; which was read twice; and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making an appropriation to defray expenses incurred, or to be incurred, under an act, entitled "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States," which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The House immediately resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the said bill; which having been considered, and the blank for the appropriation having been filled with "one million of dollars," the bill was reported to the House and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was subsequently read a third time and passed.

PROPOSED NEW STATE.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the people of Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the same into the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

This motion was supported by Mr. PITKIN, principally on the ground of the inexpediency, on general principle, of giving to a Territory embracing a population of only twenty or thirty thousand souls, a representation in the Senate equal to that possessed by other States, some of which contained a million of inhabitants. Another objection was, that the bill proposed to incorporate within a State the town and citadel of Mobile, now in possession of a foreign Power; and thus make it the duty of a State to expel from its territory a force which the President had not thought fit to remove.

The motion was opposed by Mr. POINDEXTER, who contended that the population of the Territory was much greater than was represented; and even if it were not what it is, that a precedent was to be found in the incorporation of Ohio and of Louisiana. He represented, in glowing terms, the anxiety of the people of the Territory to be enabled to bear their share of the expense as well as the dangers of the present war in support of our just rights; in which cause they had already employed twelve hundred militia, which the gentleman could not say of the populous State he represented; and, if that were not enough, they were ready to put a bayonet into the hands of every man in the Territory capable of bearing arms. As to the occupancy of Mobile by the Spaniards, it was not a valid objection; but if it were, he said he hoped it would soon be invalidated; he trusted that the spirit of the country would aid the disposition of the Executive to repel every foreign enemy from our territories.

The motion to strike out the first section was negatived, yeas 24.

After some amendment to the bill, the Committee rose and reported it to the House.

Mr. PITKIN renewed the motion to strike out the first section of the bill; which was negatived by a large majority.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

H. OF R.

Michigan Territory—Mississippi Territory.

TUESDAY, November 24.

Mr. JENNINGS said he had a resolution which he wished to submit for the consideration of the House. He said he had just received information that the Indians had again made incursion upon the frontiers of the Indiana Territory, and had killed several persons. That almost the whole of the extensive frontier of that Territory had been left to the necessity of defending themselves against their inroads. That it was impossible for the frontier inhabitants to shield themselves from their secret and unforeseen attack, unless they neglected their ordinary avocations and bestowed their whole time exclusively to the purpose of defence.

He said that the frontier of that Territory, extensive as it was, had not enjoyed one hour of security and repose, from the protection of the one company of Mounted Rangers, which had been allotted for its defence, except in the neighborhood of Vincennes, and on the river Wabash. That the balance of the frontier, which, on account of the manner in which the Indian title had been extinguished, included a distance not less than two hundred miles, had been left to defend themselves, while every description of force under the authority of the United States, had been ordered to the northwestern extreme of the Territory, and even the militia from the former unprotected part of the frontiers, had been ordered to the same point, and the wives and children of some of them had been massacred in their absence.

Mr. J. then submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to military affairs, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to cause two additional companies of Mounted Rangers to be raised for the protection of the frontiers of the Territory of Indiana.

MICHIGAN TERRITORY.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments," passed on the 11th day of January, 1805," and of providing more effectually for the government of Michigan Territory; and that the committee have leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. P. said that the object he had in view in moving this resolution, was to get rid of the salaries of the officers of that Territory. Since the surrender of Detroit their functions had ceased; yet they continued to receive their salaries, whilst one of them is a British prisoner and another has accepted a commission under the British authority. He wished to reorganize the government, and enable the proper authority to appoint other officers, and such perhaps as would administer the government of the Territory better than here tofore.

Mr. RHEA had no objection to this resolution, he said, so far as it went to affect the officers; but to a repeal of the law in toto he had a strong objection. He thought it would be construed to express an idea that some sort of relinquishment had taken place by the United States, in consequence of the temporary occupation of that Territory by a foreign Power.

Mr. POINDEXTER modified his resolution so as to read "repealing or modifying" the act, &c.

Mr. JENNINGS (delegate from Indiana) wished to ascertain the particular object of the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER stated that his object was merely to wipe off the present roll of officers of that Territory, and appoint others made of more sterling stuff. They were at present rather in a deranged state, it seemed to him; one of them prisoner to the British, and the other having accepted an appointment of Secretary of State, or something of that kind, from them. He had no idea, he said, of re-attaching Michigan to Indiana by repealing the law.

Mr. JENNINGS appeared to acquiesce in the motion, since it was not intended to re-unite the Territories.

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out of the resolution the words "repealing or."—Motion negatived.

Mr. RHEA moved that it lie on the table—Negatived.

Mr. STANFORD objected to the resolution, as going to provide further for the government of a Territory not in fact in our possession. He moved to postpone the resolution to Thursday.—Motion lost.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. MORROW, Mr. WILSON, Mr. HYNEMAN, and Mr. COOKE, were appointed the committee.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

An engrossed bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 39, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, November 25.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Jared Shattuck; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill making an appropriation for building a jail in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. LEWIS also reported a bill to incorporate an insurance company against fire in Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; which was twice read, and committed.

Ordered, That the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to naval affairs, have leave to report a bill for an increase of the Navy; and that the same committee have leave, also, to report a bill relating to Navy pensions.

CONSTITUTION AND GUERRIERE.

Mr. BASSETT communicated to the House the following documents:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 21, 1812.

SIR: In order to enable the committee to form a satisfactory opinion as to the compensation to be provided for the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution, for the capture and subsequent destruction of the British frigate the Guerriere, I have the honor to state to you that the Constitution rated 44, and mounted 55 guns; that the Guerriere rated 38, and mounted 54 guns. The Guerriere, although entirely dismasted, and in other respects much crippled, could have been brought into port, without incurring any other risk than that of recapture; but Captain Hull conceived that, if he had manned the Guerriere, for the purpose of sending her into port, he would have so far reduced the crew of the Constitution that he might have subjected both vessels to capture. He presumed that, under all circumstances, it would be better for him to destroy the Guerriere, and preserve the force of the Constitution unimpaired, and his having done so unquestionably proceeded from the most patriotic considerations.

The Guerriere was a frigate of the first class in the British navy; and, no doubt, when the engagement between the Constitution and her commenced, she was completely fitted in all respects for the most serious service. The cost of such a ship, independently of her stores, could not have been less than two hundred thousand dollars, and her stores were worth, in all probability, fifty thousand dollars at least; besides, she had on board a number of prize goods; the value of which cannot be ascertained; but was probably equal to fifty thousand dollars more. So that the whole value of the Guerriere, her stores and prize goods, at the time the action commenced, may fairly be estimated at three hundred thousand dollars.

Had Captain Hull have incurred the risk before mentioned, and succeeded in getting the Guerriere into port, the officers and crew of the Constitution; considering the Guerriere as her equal, would have been entitled to the whole of the Guerriere, her stores and prize goods. Sooner, however, than run the risk of losing the Constitution, he determined to destroy the whole. The question then arises, what, under these circumstances, ought the officers and crew to be allowed? For my own part, I have no hesitation in giving it as my opinion that the sum of one hundred thousand dollars would not be too liberal a provision; or too great an encouragement for the great gallantry, skill, and sacrifice of interest, displayed on this occasion; and I am persuaded that, if such a provision were made, the difficulties of manning our frigates, at present experienced, would vanish.

It may further be remarked, that Captain Hull, while on the cruise on which he captured and destroyed the Guerriere, burnt two enemy's vessels, viz: the brig Lady Warren and the brig Adeora, and obliged the enemy to burn the brig Dolphin, with a cargo of hemp and Russia goods, and to abandon an English barque laden with timber: for no part of which have the officers or crew of the Constitution received any compensation.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

PAUL HAMILTON.

Hon. B. BASSETT.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23, 1812.

SIR: In compliance with your request I have the honor to state to you that my opinion, as to the value of the Guerriere, at the time the action between her and the Constitution commenced, is, that, exclusively of her stores and prize goods, she was probably worth two hundred thousand dollars; and my impression is, that her stores and prize goods must have been worth one hundred thousand dollars.

I am informed that, independently of their stores, the frigate President cost two hundred and twenty thousand dollars; that the Chesapeake cost two hundred and twenty thousand dollars; and that the Congress cost one hundred and ninety-seven thousand dollars. These vessels were certainly built on good terms; and it is from their cost that I form my idea as to the probable value of the Guerriere; and my impression as to the value of her stores and prize goods is derived from personal observation and information obtained on the occasion from different persons.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC HULL.

Hon. BURWELL BASSETT, Chairman, &c.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message of the 4th instant as relates to the late importations of British manufactures; also, the petitions of sundry merchants (enumerated in the report) report, that they have bestowed on the subject a degree of attention proportioned to its importance; that they have, in the present investigation, confined themselves to the cases of importations directly from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and that the result of their examination and inquiries will be found:

1st. In a correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury.

2d. In a detailed examination of committees of merchants from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and some accompanying documents.

3d. In a statement made by Mr. Russell, late Chargé des Affaires of the United States at the Court of London, who, at the request of the committee, was so obliging as to attend them and give this statement.

That, on a view of the whole subject, the committee are of opinion, that the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to remit or mitigate the penalties and forfeitures incurred, should an interposition in either way be called for by the circumstances of the case; they, therefore, recommend that it be

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to legislate upon the subject, and that the petition, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The said report was read, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

MEDALS AND PRIZE MONEY.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Naval Committee on the proposed vote of a gold medal to Captain Isaac Hull, late commander of the frigate Constitution, and silver medals to the other officers, and a sum of — thousand dollars, to be distributed as prize-money among the officers and crew, as an expression of the sense entertained by this House of their bravery and conduct in attacking and vanquishing the British frigate Guerriere.

Mr. BASSETT spoke in support of the resolution. He stated the magnitude of the achievement; the amount of value of the capture; and assigned many reasons particularly in favor of the donation to the officers and crew, on whom collectively he proposed to bestow the sum of $100,000, and made a motion to that effect. He said the prize money arising from the capture, had not the public service required the destruction of the Guerriere, would have amounted to much more; and the merits of those concerned in the capture entitled them to this remuneration. He dilated on the present low price of wages on board our public ships, and adverted to the seaman's hardships and the seaman's risk, &c.

The question on filling up the blank with "one hundred thousand dollars," was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—50 to 37.

The Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolution.

Mr. M'KEE stated that his mind was not made up on this subject; that some documents had been read, which on perusal might affect his decision. He wished them printed; he desired time also to consult the Constitution as to the power of the House to vote away money in this manner. He, therefore, moved that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. BASSETT seconded the motion; the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the judges of the district and territorial courts of the United States.

The bill makes it incumbent on the judges to reside within their respective districts; and makes it unlawful for them to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney.

Mr. STANFORD was opposed to the latter provision. The compensations of the judges of the district courts were so limited (and the House had within a day or two refused an augmentation of them) that they were compelled to resort to other means of subsistence than their salaries. This provision would deprive them of the means of support. He moved to amend it so as to limit the preclusion to the courts of the United States, not affecting the practice in the State courts.

Mr. POINDEXTER replied that the duties of advocate and judge were incompatible; and if they were not, that it was beneath the dignity of a judge to descend to practice in the courts.

Mr. STANFORD's motion was negatived.

An amendment was moved by Mr. POINDEXTER, making territorial judges impeachable before the Legislatures of the several territories; and declaring that, on conviction of the offences created by this act, they shall be removed from office by the President of the United States.

This proposition was opposed by Messrs. GOLD, STANFORD, and RHEA, and supported by Mr. POINDEXTER. It was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. JENNINGS moved a new section to the bill, going to prevent any judge of any territory from holding at the same time any other office of profit or emolument not derived from the President and Senate of the United States.

This amendment was opposed by Mr. RHEA, and supported by Mr. JENNINGS, and agreed to, 43 to 35.

Mr. JENNINGS moved another section, disqualifying any person holding an office under the Government of the United States or from the Governor of said Territory, from eligibility to office as delegate in Congress of the United States.—Adopted, yeas 57.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, and the amendment having been ratified by the vote of the House, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, yeas 50.

FRIDAY, November 27.

A new member, to wit: from Georgia, WILLIAM BARNETT, returned to serve as a member of this House, in the place of Howell Cobb, resigned, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

NOVEMBER, 1812.

Increase of the Navy.

H. of R.

An engrossed bill concerning the District and Territorial Judges of the United States, was read the third time, and recommended to a select committee, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. ORMSBY, Mr. PICKENS, Mr. TALIAFERRO, and Mr. STRONG, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. McKEE,

Ordered, That the report of the Commissioners of the Eastern District of the Territory of Orleans, on the claims to lands in said district, which they have not confirmed, laid before the House on the 9th of January, 1812, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BASSETT, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to naval affairs, made a report, in part, on the expediency of increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States; which was read.

Mr. BASSETT, from the same committee, also reported a bill providing navy pensions, in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. BASSETT, from the same committee, presented a bill to increase the Navy of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The following is the report which accompanied the bill for increasing the Navy:

That, in performance of the duty assigned them, the committee could not fail to advert to the report made at the last session of Congress on this subject. Having adverted to it, they could not fail, from the justness of its reasoning, to rely on it, and pray that it may be taken as part of their report. The little experience as yet afforded us in naval warfare, corroborates the principles there contended for, and in this view they think themselves supported by that passage in the President's Message which says: "Our trade, with little exception, has reached our ports; having been much favored in it by the course pursued by a squadron of our frigates under the command of Commodore Rodgers."

They therefore concurred in the opinion, that it is proper to increase the Naval Establishment. For information as to the mode of increase, they applied to the Navy Department, and obtained the documents which they submit to the House. The comparative effect of vessels of different rates must be considered as demonstrated by these documents. Yet were your committee apprized, that in the complicated system of naval warfare no one principle could be relied on as applicable to all times and all occasions, but that a patient comparison of many principles was necessary to a just conclusion. They were apprized that facility of movement should be combined with efficiency of force. Nor were they regardless of the benefit of occasional division. Inasmuch, however, as great gain will sometimes follow from the power to operate on many points at once, yet at others it may be all-important to give unity to your force. To obtain the three things desired, it is essential your Naval Establishment comprise ships of different rates. It is evident, too, from the documents, that you economise in men and money, by providing some of the larger ships. This conclusion, so well fortified by reason, is found in unison with the practice of all nations who have had the fiscal and other means of procuring a navy. Indeed it would seem almost the spontaneous effect of instinct, without the aid of reason, to oppose like with like. To yield the advantage of the sabre, the bayonet, or fire arms, to your enemy, would by all men be deemed miserable policy. Can reason change with the element? Let us then have for defence 76, 38, and 16-gun ships; because we are opposed to an enemy possessing all these means of attack, and because they combine all advantages in naval warfare. It is not the intention of your committee to put aside the gunboats; but they believe that, considering the opportunity afforded them for action, that an ample portion of that species of force has been provided. Your committee cannot conclude their report without bringing to the view of the House the fact, that the naval superiority of Great Britain, which secures her integrity and supports her dignity, is maintained at a cost much below the Military Establishments of the Continent. And it is with something like exultation, as republicans, that they present a species of national force that, whilst it will best subserve the national defence, can operate least on the national liberty. It is a bright attribute in the history of the tar, that he has never destroyed the rights of the nation. In its defence only is he to be found. Thus, aided by economy and fortified by republican principle, your committee think they ought strongly to recommend that the fostering care of the nation be extended to the Naval Establishment. It is far, very far, from your committee, to extend their views of a navy to the mad and wicked prospect of foreign conquest, or a silly contest to be mistress of the ocean. Their view is limited to their own defence, and to enforce respect to their just rights. To the objection that it is the nature of man to run into extremes, they answer, that it is the end, not the beginning, we should guard against. It is surely yielding much of the argument to surrender all of the subject that is good, and require submission to evil that good may come thereof. Rather separate the wheat from the chaff, show the good and the bad. Let it be impressed on every citizen, that to use force to protect and maintain the rights and liberties of his country was his first duty; whilst it is the greatest of crimes to attack with force the rights of others.

It can require no subtlety to enforce the distinction between defence and offence. Neither can it require argument to prove, that the first ought not to be abandoned as being more than life's worth, though the other may be deprecated as the consummation of wickedness. Limited to the view of defence and protection, the committee directed their chairman to ask leave of the House to report a bill to increase the Navy of the United States.

Documents.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, NOV. 13, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor of transmitting herewith, for the information of the committee of the House of Representatives, of which you are the chairman, certain papers marked A, B, C, and D.

From the paper A, it appears that a seventy-six gun ship mounting eighty-eight guns, discharges in one round 3,176 lbs. of cannon ball; that a forty-four gun frigate, mounting fifty-four guns, discharges in one round 1,488 lbs. of cannon ball; that a seventy-six discharges at one broadside 1,588 lbs., and that a forty-four gun frigate discharges at one broadside 744 lbs of ball. The question then arises; what is the intrinsic relative force of a seventy-six and a forty-four?

H. OF R.

Increase of the Navy.

NOVEMBER, 1812.

Suppose two forty-four gun frigates should be brought into combat with a seventy-six, one on the larboard, the other on the starboard quarter; each frigate, presenting a broadside of 744 lbs. of ball, will have to contend against a battery of 1,588 lbs. As 744 lbs. is to 1,588 lbs. so would be the relative metal of a seventy-six and two large forty-four gun frigates; difference against the frigates 844 lbs. weight of metal. It is obvious, then, that two forty-four gun frigates could not contend with a seventy-six with the least probability of success.

Suppose a third frigate, attacking alternately on the starboard and larboard quarter, should join in the combat, while two of the frigates should be operating on one quarter, with a difference in weight of metal against them of 100 lbs.; the third frigate would be contending on the other, with a difference against her of 844 lbs.

It might be observed that the frigates would all attack on one quarter, and then with 2,232 lbs. of metal they would have to contend with only 1,588 lbs. having a difference in their favor of 644 lbs. In reply it may be observed, that three frigates could not take such a position, on any one quarter, as would enable them to bring all their broadsides to bear at once upon an object moving through the water with as much celerity as themselves; moreover, a frigate would always avoid the broadside of a seventy-six—for one well directed broadside from a seventy-six, at close shot, would inevitably blow her out of the water. Witness the Randolph with the Yarmouth. Frigates would attack in various directions, change their position frequently, and avoid the tremendous battery of a seventy-six as much as possible.

Besides, a seventy-six is built of heavier timber, is intrinsically much stronger than a frigate, in all her works, and can sustain battering much longer and with less injury. A shot which would sink a frigate might be received by a seventy-six with but little injury—it might pass between wind and water through a frigate, when it would stick in the frame of a seventy-six.

All things considered, it must be admitted that one seventy-six gun ship, mounting eighty-six, is equal in combat to three frigates mounting one hundred and sixty-two guns. Admitting this equality, other questions present themselves for consideration: and,

1st. What is the relative expense of building and equipping these vessels?

2d. What is the relative number of their crews?

3d. What is their relative annual expense in actual service?

To ascertain the expense of building and equipping a frigate, we will take the actual cost of one of our largest, viz: the President, which was $220,910; a frigate would then cost - - - $220,910

The cost of a seventy-six cannot be so easily ascertained; however, from the papers B and C, we may, I think, estimate the expense of building and equipping a seventy-four at not exceeding - - - 333,000

The construction, then, of a force in frigates equal in combat to a seventy-six gun ship, would cost - - - 662,730

Making, in this view, a difference in favor of the seventy-six, of - - - 339,730

As, then, $333,000 is to $661,730, so would be the relative expense of building and equipping a seventy-six, and a force in frigates equal to a seventy-six, making a difference, in favor of the seventy-six of - $329,730

By the paper A, it appears that a seventy-six requires, to man her, six hundred and fifty men, and that a forty-four requires four hundred and twenty. To man three forty-four gun frigates, or a force in frigates equal to a seventy-six, would then require twelve hundred and sixty men; and in this respect we find a difference in favor of the seventy-six of six hundred and ten men; that is, six hundred and fifty men on board of a seventy-six can direct as much force as twelve hundred and sixty can on board of three frigates.

As to the relative expense, we have heretofore estimated the annual cost of a frigate of forty-four guns, at $110,000; and, from the best information we can obtain upon the subject, the annual expense of a seventy-six will not exceed $202,110.

The annual expense then of three frigates, or a force in frigates equal to a seventy-six, would be $330,000; while a seventy-six would not cost exceeding $202,110; making, in this respect, a difference in favor of the seventy-six of $127,890 annually.

In examining the relative strength of frigates and ships of war, and of ships of war and gunboats, we shall find similar results in favor of the larger class of vessels.

Hence, if the only object in view was to employ the greatest intrinsic naval force, at the least expense, I should think there would be no difficulty in deciding that we ought to have none but ships of the greatest magnitude. But in providing a naval armament there are other considerations of the highest importance. We should inquire, what kind of force will, most probably, be brought against us; with what description of force can we meet the enemy, with the greatest probability of success, and afford the most effectual protection to our commerce; and upon these highly interesting points, I will take the liberty of submitting a very valuable communication (D) received from Charles Stewart, Esq., a captain in the Navy of the United States—an officer of great observation, distinguished talents, and very extensive professional experience—observing, that I believe all the most enlightened officers in our service concur in the opinions he has expressed.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

PAUL HAMILTON.

U. S. FRIGATE CONSTELLATION,

November 12, 1812.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 11th instant in which you state "the desire of the Naval Committee to possess the most comprehensive information upon naval subjects, particularly the description of marine force best adapted to our defence, and the relative efficiency of vessels of different rates." In compliance therewith, I have the honor to answer the questions you propound as follows:

Question 1. What, in your opinion, is the relative efficiency of our ships-of-the-line, say 74's, and large frigates?

Answer. The relative efficiency or force of a 74-gun ship and large frigates is as one to three.

COMPARATIVE FORCE.

Frigate of 50 guns.
Gun-deck,	30	24	pounders,
Quarter-deck	14	32	lb. carronades,
Forecastle	6	32	do. do.
<hr/>
Guns	50	1,360	lbs. shot each round.
Men	430

480 guns and men.

Ship-of-the-Line, 74 guns.

Lower gun-deck	28	42	pounders,
Upper do. do.	30	24	do.
Quarter-deck	16	42	do. carronades,
Forecastle	8	42	do. do.
Do.	2	24	do. do.
Poop	4	68	do. do.

Guns	88	3,224	lbs. each round.

738 guns and men.

Argument. By the above comparison it appears, that a 74 gun ship discharges at one round 3,224 lbs. of shot, and a frigate of the first class 1,360 lbs; it therefore clearly proves the position or relative force, in point of metal, to be 1 to 3, or thereabouts. When this circumstance is considered jointly with the following, it must appear to others, as it does to me, that as you increase the class of the ship you increase the force in the proportion of one to three, and diminish proportionally the expense of building, equipping, and supporting them in commission, which may easily be established by estimate from the department, and the experience of all other maritime nations.

Ships-of-the-line are much stronger in scantling, thicker in the sides and bottom, less penetrable to the shot, and consequently less liable to be torn or battered to pieces, or sunk; the additional room being more than in proportion to the additional number of men, leaves greater space for water and provisions, and admits of her wings being kept clear, that shot penetrating below the water the holes can readily be plugged up from the inside and her sinking thereby prevented; hence we have seen ships-of-the-line capable of battering one another for several hours, and if not too much crippled in the spars and rigging enabled to renew an action on following days. I am aware that some are of opinion, that a more divided force is better calculated for action, from the advantageous position that would be given to a part; suppose three frigates of 50 guns were to undertake to batter a 74 gun ship, and that two of them were to occupy the quarter and stern of the 74, (this is placing them in the most favorable position,) the other frigate engaged abreast, everything would then depend on the time the frigate abreast could maintain that position to enable the other two to act with effect on the stern and quarter. But it must appear evident to all acquainted with the two classes of ships, that the frigate abreast could not withstand the fire of so heavy and compact a battery many minutes; and in all probability would be dismasted or sunk the first or second broadside. This would decide the fate of the other two. Much might be said upon the superiority of ships-of-the-line over frigates in the attack of batteries or their defence; on the security of valuable convoys of merchant ships, or troops sent on an expedition; but their advantages in these respects must be apparent to all, however unacquainted with nautical affairs.

Question 2. What, in your opinion, is the relative efficiency or force of large frigates and sloops of war?

Answer. The relative efficiency of large frigates and sloops of war is at least one to two.

COMPARATIVE FORCE.

Gun-deck, 30 24-pounders,
Quarter-deck, 14 32-pounders, carronade.
Forecastle, 6 32-pounders, carronade.
Fifty guns, 1,360 lbs. shot, and 430 men—making 480 guns and men.

Question 3. What description of naval force do you think best adapted to the defence of our coast and commerce?

Answer. Ships-of-the-line are best calculated for the defence of our coast, and for the protection of our inward and outward commerce, when engaged in war with a foreign maritime Power.

Argument. It cannot be supposed, in a war with a foreign maritime Power, that that Power will only send to our coasts frigates and smaller cruisers, because we possess no other description of vessels. Their first object will be to restrain, by ships-of-the-line, our frigates and other cruisers from departing and preying upon their commerce; their next object will be to send their smaller cruisers in pursuit of our commerce, and by having their ships-of-the-line parading on our coast, threatening our more exposed seaport towns, and preventing the departure of our small cruisers, they will be capturing what commerce may have escaped theirs, and recapturing what prizes may have fallen into our hands. Thirdly, they can, at any time, withdraw their ships-of-the-line, should a more important object require it, without hazarding much on their part; and return in sufficient time to shut out our cruisers that may have departed during their absence. Fourthly, they can, at all times, consult their convenience in point of time and numbers; and will incur no expense and risk of transports, for provisions and water; but can go and procure their supplies at pleasure and return to their station ere their absence is known to us.

Question 4. What description of force do you think best calculated to prosecute the present war, and any future war in which we may be engaged?

Answer. For the prosecution of the present war with the most effect, a mixed naval force of the following description, is, in my opinion, the best calculated.

Ships-of-the-line, to rate, in honor of the year of our Independence, seventy-sixes, to mount as follows:

28 42 pounders on the lower gun-deck,
30 24 pounders on the upper gun-deck,

24 42 pound carronades on quarter-deck and forecastle.
2 24 pounders on forecastle,
4 68 pound carronades on poop.

68 guns.

Frigates to rate forty guns to mount as follows:

30 24 pounders on gun-deck,
20 32 pound carronades on quarter-deck and forecastle.

50 guns.

Frigates to rate thirty-two guns to mount as follows:

26 18 pounders on gun-deck,
16 24 pound carronades on quarter-deck and forecastle.

42 guns.

Corvette ships to rate sixteen guns to mount as follows:

18 32 pound carronades,

20 guns.

Argument. By having a proportion of these classes of ship of war, the inner squadron, or guarda costa, may be composed of the ships-of-the-line, and a few of the 32 gun ships, for repeaters and look out ships. Hence, it would produce one of two results, either that the enemy would be obliged to abandon our coast, or bring on it a much greater force, at least double our number, out of which they will be obliged to keep on our coast a superiority at all the hazards of the sea; and, at great additional expense, and risk of transports, to provision and water them. But should they, from other circumstances, be unable to keep up this superiority on our coast, the door will be kept open, for the ingress and egress of our cruisers, and their prizes, while our other classes of ships may be sent in pursuit of their smaller cruisers and commerce. These observations will apply to all future wars in which we may be engaged with the maritime Powers; but as we might more frequently be engaged with the Barbary Powers, the frigates and 16 gun ships, would be better adapted to that species of warfare. They have no ships-of-the-line. The ships-of-the-line could then be laid up in ordinary, dismantled, and preserved at a small expense.

Question 5. Would not the erection of docks for the repairs of our vessels produce a great saving in expense, labor, and risk; and would not docks greatly expedite the refitting of our ships?

Answer. A dry dock, agreeable to a plan I furnished the Department some time since, to be freed from water by pumps or drains, will be indispensable for the repair of ships of war, and will be the least expensive way of repairing the bottoms of our ships, and will expedite the outfit in point of time one to ten.

Argument. A ship of war wanting repairs done to her bottom, or coppering, must be turned down one side at a time to undergo that repair; therefore, to prepare a ship for that process requires that her upper masts should be taken down, and all her guns, stores, water casks, ballast, ammunition, etc. should be taken out—which leads to great loss, waste, and labor: and the time occupied in the process will be from two to three weeks, and as much more time will be required to re-rig, re-equip, and replace her guns, stores, and other materials. The preparation to dock a ship of war can be done in twelve hours. All that is necessary to be done, is to take out the guns, and pump the water out of the water casks, and when in the dock the repairs of her bottom can progress on both sides at the same time. Should a ship of war require a thorough repair throughout, it can never be effectually done but in a dock; for instance, in repairing ships of war in the water, they are liable to have the fine form of their bottom spoiled, by hogging, spreading, or warping, which will materially affect their sailing. Ships wanting thorough repairs require all the plank stripped off inside and outside, their beams, knees, and clamps taken out; these are all they have to bind their frames together, and thereby preserve their shape; but when stripped of them to make room for the new, they are liable to hog from the greater weight and body of timber being in the fore and after end, at which places there is no pressure upwards caused by the water, as those ends are sharp; the two extremes of the ship are liable to sink in the water, while the body or middle of the ship rises with the upward pressure of the water. The next consideration in repairing the bottoms in the water, though not of such vital importance, is not unworthy of serious attention; the bolting in the bottom ought to be driven from the outside; but when repaired afloat they are under the necessity of driving them from the inside; hence the bottom will not be so strong, nor so well secured.

The time for answering the several questions propounded to me in your letter of the 11th instant, being very short, and a great deal being required by my other avocations, will, I trust, be a sufficient apology for my not going more largely and minutely into the subject, as also for any inaccuracies which I may have committed. I will, therefore, close this communication with an expression of my hopes that, whatever may be proposed by the Naval Committee to Congress on this subject, they will strongly recommend to their consideration the necessity of having what they propose for the increase of the Navy of the best seasoned materials, which will be by far the cheapest, and be longer in a state for active service. I trust their past experience will prove to their satisfaction this position, that the best materials are always the cheapest, and that a slow increase is better than a hasty and temporary one.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant.

CHARLES STEWART.

Statement showing the proportions of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, required for a ship-of-the-line, say a 76 and a 44 gun frigate:

A 76 requires 280 able seamen and 233 ordinary seamen and boys; a 44 requires 140 able seamen and 172 ordinary seamen and boys.

NOTE.—280 able seamen is considered by practical men as too great a proportion for a first rate 76. The whole number of able and ordinary seamen and boys is 613; and practical men say that they may be classed thus: able seamen 220, ordinary seamen, &c. 293. It is observed by those acquainted with ships-of-the-line, that to manage their sails does not require more able seamen than are required to manage the sails of a large frigate.

A force in frigates equal to a 76 would then require 420 able seamen, a 76 would require 220—making a difference in this respect of 200 able seamen in favor of the 76.

In 1798 and 1799 no difficulty was experienced in procuring able seamen; we could frequently in one week man a frigate. One among other considerations, which induced able seamen to enter then with so much alacrity, was because the enemy we were then contending with had not afloat (with very few exceptions) vessels superior in rate to frigates. The enemy we are fighting have ships-of-the-line; and our sailors know the great difference between that class of vessels and frigates, and cannot but feel a degree of reluctance at entering the service, from the evident disparity. Build ships-of-the-line, and you will man them with more ease than you now can a sloop of war.

In 1798, 1799, and 1800, we had near 4,000 able seamen in the Navy, a number sufficient to man 18 ships-of-the-line.

Ordinary seamen can always be procured in abundance.

MONDAY, November 30.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to authorize the sale of the Glebe, situate within the county of Alexandria, and to provide for determining the adverse claims to the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the bill making provision for an additional number of general officers, and it was re-committed to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to Military Affairs.

TUESDAY, December 1.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "concerning the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and others, of the Army, and for other purposes," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were read, and, together with the bill, referred to the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a report of the Commissioners for ascertaining and adjusting the claims to land in the late Territory of Louisiana, now Missouri, of the rejected claims filed with the Recorder; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to incorporate an insurance company against fire in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, which was gone through, reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

On motion of Mr. LACOCK, the House resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the naturalization laws.

On motion of Mr. LACOCK, the bill was amended by adding thereto the following additional section:

"And be it further enacted, That every naturalized citizen of the United States, or the Territories thereof, shall forfeit such citizenship on his voluntarily departing from and remaining out of the United States for and during the term of two years."

On motion of Mr. FITCH, the following other section was also incorporated in the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That all persons who shall have been naturalized subsequent to the 18th day of June last, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States, from the date of such naturalization, anything in the declaration of war against Great Britain, or any other act, to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. FISK moved to strike out nine months, the time allowed to citizens to take the benefit of our naturalization laws, and insert three. He said he could not see why so long a time should be allowed. The longest time extended to our citizens in Canada is thirty days; and he did not see why so much more liberality should be extended to their citizens here. He was opposed to their remaining here longer than necessary, the more especially, as they employed themselves in exciting divisions, and fomenting the party feuds which now agitate the country.

Mr. LACOCK thought the time proposed was too short; that in some districts they could scarcely hear of the law within that time, and at any rate might not be able to meet with a tribunal, at which to comply with the requisites of the naturalization law, before the expiration of that period.

Mr. FISK withdrew his motion for the present.

EXPORTATION OF PROVISIONS.

Mr. NEWTON offered the following resolution for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what restrictions on the exportation of provisions, and of all articles necessary for naval equipment, in vessels of foreign nations at amity with the United States, may at this time be expedient; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. N. said it was well known that there was not a day passed over our heads but American vessels were departing for Spanish and Portuguese ports, unrestricted as to the exportations of provisions and naval stores. It was also well known that the nation with whom we are at war had in our vicinity possessions requiring the use of these articles. It was as well known, that although we were at war with Great Britain, she had agents in this country, who, under the Spanish and Portuguese flag, had it in their power to supply those possessions with such articles in this country as they stood in need of. It was with a view to cutting off the supplies daily sent from this country to Halifax, Newfoundland, Bermuda, &c., that he had proposed the inquiry. The House had already decided, contrary to his wish, that there should be no embargo—that the exportation of provisions should not entirely cease in vessels of foreign nations at amity with us—but, as in duty bound, he acquiesced in its decision. The resolution he had offered had not for its object to prevent the exportation to any country other than that of the enemy; but his wish was to require a bond from these vessels, before they departed from the United States, that their cargo should be landed in a friendly port; that they should not, directly on leaving port, steer for St. John's, or Halifax, or Bermuda, or any other British port. This was the view he had in proposing the motion, and he hoped the House would accept it.

Mr. GOLD said the resolution was illy adapted to the object, as avowed, which appeared to be to guard against improper destinations, and not against exportation. In its present form it was calculated to excite much speculation and alarm. He hoped it would be so modified as to adapt the phraseology to the avowed intention.

Mr. BASSETT concurred in opinion with Mr. GOLD, and moved to modify the resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring bonds on the exportation of provisions, and all articles necessary for naval equipment, in vessels of foreign nations at amity with the United States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise."

DECEMBER, 1812.

Exportation of Provisions.

H. OF R.

Mr. NEWTON was not disposed to contend for the form, if the substance was retained, and therefore consented to the modification proposed.

Mr. MACON expressed his regret that the resolution had not been more broad and comprehensive. He had no fear of creating alarm in the public mind, or exciting speculation, because, he said, the people would understand that nothing but an inquiry was proposed, which involved no decision of the question of expediency.

Mr. BASSETT said he had hoped, after the decision of the House the other day by an overwhelming majority, that the agricultural or farming interest would not be again attacked in this way. The adoption of such a resolution, said he, will excite alarm—it will excite speculation. The merchant will go to the farmer and buy up his produce at a reduced price, telling him that Congress were now legislating on the subject. Mr. B. said he had heard of these arguments being used heretofore, and that they did induce many farmers to sell their produce at twenty-five, per cent. less than they would have done but for this argument. The adoption of the resolution would have a very material effect on the price of produce. He did not fear the ultimate adoption of any provision on this subject, because he was perfectly satisfied that when gentlemen came to reduce their views to paper they would find their object impracticable. But he did not wish the subject stirred at all. Speculation was one of the great banes of our Government, and he at least would always do everything in his power to put it down; he was therefore opposed to this motion.

Mr. MILNOR entirely agreed in opinion with Mr. BASSETT, as to the impropriety of doing anything which should have a tendency to excite speculation. Already there was a bill on the table which, if passed, would go to cut up by the roots great part of the present export trade, by prohibiting the use of the licenses which made it safe. The present proposition, originating with the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, in its original form would have excited great alarm. He was, therefore, pleased at the modification; but he thought it did not go far enough, and therefore proposed to amend it by adding, after the words "United States," the words "conditioned that such vessel and cargo shall not proceed to an enemy's port."

Mr. RHEA moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the words "or to any port or ports in possession of the enemy."—Agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. MILNOR's motion, as amended, and negative—51 to 50.

The question was then taken on the resolution, in the form proposed by Mr. BASSETT, and negative—56 to 49.

A short time afterwards—

Mr. NEWTON said it appeared to him that the House had rejected the resolution above-mentioned more on account of its phraseology than its import. He was, therefore, induced to propose it again in rather a different shape, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what restrictions on the exportation of provisions, and all articles necessary for military and naval equipments, in vessels of foreign nations at amity with the United States, may at this time be expedient; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise."

On the question of agreeing to consider this resolution, he called the yeas and nays, which stood as follows: For considering it 56, against it 57, as follows:

YEAS—William Anderson, Ezekiel Bacon, William Barnett, William W. Bibb, Robert Brown, William Butler, James Cochran, Lewis Conduct, Wm. So the House refused further to consider the subject.

WEDNESDAY, December 2.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom were referred the several petitions, presented at the present session, praying an extension of the time limited by law for the payment for lands purchased by the United States, and the resolution of the 16th ultimo, upon the same subject, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented certain documents; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the report of that committee on the several petitions of the merchants relative to bonds lately given to the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to military affairs, presented a bill supplementary to an act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States, and for classing the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. FISK, from the committee appointed on the 21st ultimo, presented a bill to alter the time and place of holding the circuit and district courts in Vermont; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. POINDESTER, from the committee to whom had been referred the bill concerning the district and territorial judges, as amended, reported a recommendation that the amendments made thereto in the House be stricken out.

The House concurred in the report—44 to 36; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The engrossed bill to incorporate a fire insurance company in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was read a third time, and passed.

A motion was made that the House do proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the whole House on the resolution for the presentation of a gold medal, &c. to Captain Hull; and, the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred sundry petitions for a prolongation of the time of payment for public lands, and also a resolution on the subject, made a report concluding with a recommendation of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That such parts of the laws for the sale of the public lands, as allow a credit on part of the purchase money, be repealed, and that the price at which the lands shall be offered in future, shall be one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

Resolved, That, in future sales, a portion of the public land be offered in tracts of eighty acres.

Resolved, That two years be given in addition to the terms now allowed by law, to the purchasers of public lands, whose time of payment shall have or may expire on or before the first day of January, 1814, on condition that all the interest that has accrued or may accrue, on or before the first day of March next, shall be paid on that day, and the interest that may become due thereafter shall be paid at the day on which the time, according to the existing laws, shall expire for making payment."

The report was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of the bonds given by sundry merchants on account of recent importations of British goods. [The report recommends a reference of all the petitions on the subject to the Secretary of the Treasury.]

Numerous documents were read by the Clerk, generally tending to show that but little profit was made by the merchants on their recent importations, and they were innocent of intentional violations of the prohibitory law.

After the reading of these documents was concluded,

Mr. CHEVES rose and stated that it had not been his good fortune to agree with the Committee of Ways and Means in the report which he had been by them directed to make to the House. He rose merely to state this fact; and it would now devolve on some other member of the Committee to exhibit the reasons on which the report was predicated.

Mr. JOHNSON said the House would readily perceive the disagreeable situation in which the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means were placed in being deprived of the aid of the abilities of the gentleman who was chairman of the committee. Mr. J. said he had intended himself to offer some observations to the House on the subject; but the day was so far spent in reading the documents, that he was not desirous to-day to offer himself to the House on that question. He therefore moved that the Committee rise.

The Committee accordingly rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

EXPORT OF PROVISIONS.

Mr. HARPER said, that the House had yesterday refused to consider a resolution, offered by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NEWTON,) on the subject of inquiring into the propriety of restricting the exportation of breadstuffs, &c., when the House was thinner than at present, some members having been absent. With a view to try the question in a full House, he moved that the House do now proceed to a consideration of the resolution.

And the question being taken, there appeared—yeas 58, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—William Anderson, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, William Barnett, William W. Bibb, Robert Brown, William Butler, Francis Carr, Matthew Clay, James Cochran, Lewis Condict, William Crawford, Roger Davis, Joseph Desha, Samuel Dinsmoor, Elias Earle, William Findley, James Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Isiah L. Mr. SPEAKER said, he believed he should vote against the proposition at any time, and it was rather too late in the day to take it up now.

He therefore voted in the negative, and the House adjourned.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the petition of the Commercial Company of the City of Washington, presented on the eighth of June, 1812, was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to military affairs, made a report on the amendments of the Senate to the bill "concerning the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and others, of the Army, and for other purposes;" which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth concur in the said amendments, with amendments.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of disqualifying any of the Judges of the Territories of the United States from holding any other office of profit or trust, other than from the President and Senate of the United States.

Resolved, That they do likewise inquire what amendments, if any, are necessary to be made to the qualifications requisite to a seat as a delegate in the Congress of the United States, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. LYLE, Mr. McKEE, and Mr. BARNETT, were appointed the committee.

An engrossed bill altering the time and place of holding the Circuit and District Courts in Vermont was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill concerning the District and Territorial Judges of the United States was read the third time, and passed.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The House resumed the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the petition of sundry merchants, praying a remission of the bonds given on the recent importation of British goods.

Mr. JOHNSON, after some preliminary remarks, said the Committee of Ways and Means had examined the subject of the late importations of British manufactures with considerable attention; and after much deliberation and difficulty, had reported a resolution to the House recommending a reference of the whole subject to the Secretary of the Treasury, who had ample power over it. The President had, in his very able and lucid communication to Congress, at the commencement of the session, represented to them that a considerable number of American vessels had arrived in the United States laden with British manufactures, under an erroneous impression that the non-importation act would cease to operate upon a revocation of the British Orders in Council by the order of the 23d of June last, and upon a subject of such magnitude the Secretary of the Treasury had not exercised the power of mitigating the forfeitures incurred, that Congress might have previously an opportunity of making such provision as they might deem expedient, and recommending this body to consult equally what is due to equitable considerations on the part of the merchant, and what is due to the public interest.

It has not been recommended to Congress to interpose, but an opportunity has been given, that Congress might, if the views of the Secretary of the Treasury did not correspond with their own. The Secretary of the Treasury has expressed himself in the same character. Considering the magnitude of the subject, and the unforeseen nature of the case, it was thought proper not to exercise the authority vested in the Treasury Department, until Congress had taken the subject into consideration, and prescribed, if it was thought proper, the course to be pursued. There is no reluctance expressed either in the President's communication or in Mr. Gallatin's report to act upon the subject, and independent of this evidence several members of the committee know personally that the Secretary of the Treasury feels no embarrassment in acting, provided the matter should be left for his disposition.

Why did the Secretary of the Treasury suspend his decision in this case until the will of Congress should be known? The reason is obvious. The consideration was weighty. By the infraction of an existing statute, the non-importation act, British manufactures to the value of twenty millions of dollars had become forfeited to the Government of the United States. The vessels and cargoes had been seized, and suits in every case commenced in compliance with statutory regulations.

This twenty million of dollars belonged to the United States by forfeiture. The Secretary of the Treasury, consulting equally in his decision equitable considerations and the public interest, formed his opinion, as expressed in writing, that there ought not to be an unqualified remission of the penalties and forfeitures in favor of the importer, nor a total exaction for the public benefit. But, that the one-half of the forfeitures, which would otherwise fall to the share of collectors, ought to be remitted; that with respect to one-half belonging to the United States, justice to the community requires, that, when remitted, at least an equivalent may be secured to the public for the extra profit beyond that on common importations which arises from the continuance of the non-importation act. This opinion, formed and expressed, was not executed, although the power was without limit. It was wisely delayed, that an opportunity might be given to the Representatives of the people to object to such a mitigation. The power of remission or mitigation once exercised would effectually destroy the right of the Government. And as a favorite act, a measure of redress against a foreign enemy, had been violated, by which these forfeitures had accrued, it was due to Congress, that an opportunity should be afforded to object to such dispensing power, and to make any provision that they might deem expedient. It must have been this view of the subject which delayed the Secretary of the Treasury in the exercise of his mitigating powers, and not any unwillingness on his part on this as it never has been on other occasions to do his duty, without a desire to shrink from responsibility. Why object to this reference? Why interpose in this case? No new power is given. It was given under the Administration of General WASHINGTON. It has been continued until the present moment, consecrated by the necessity of the provision. Take the power away in this instance—you do not propose to take it away in any other—it will remain as it has remained from the foundation of this Government, a permanent and indispensable provision. No individual wishes to change the statute, nor shift the power; why interpose then in this case? The opposition comes from those who contend for an unconditional remission of the bonds; of course the objection does not arise from the extent of the power, or the nature of the power, but because the power is not exercised in its greatest extent. Indeed no objection can be made to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury; the statute does not give him the power of committing violence; it does not legalize any outrages. No, sir; it gives him the power of remitting or mitigating forfeitures and penalties, in whole or in part, incurred by a violation of the laws of the land. If the power should be exercised, and the bonds of the importers cancelled, then, sir, the rights of the United States are gone forever. But, if too much should be exacted, if the conditions of remission should be oppressive, we have lost none of our power to interpose; the friends of unqualified remission cannot, therefore, object to the power, because they have the advantage ground of those who are not willing wholly to sacrifice the public interest. If this proposition wanted support from any farther considerations, they might be added. As it respected the United States, it was important that the exercise of the power of the Secretary should be delayed; but on account of the petitioners it was not. Take the case of "A" alone, and Congress would not be called upon to interpose. The subject would not be of sufficient magnitude; but when you unite the case of B, C, D, and the whole of the alphabet, if you will, then comes the objection; the pecuniary interest of the merchant, and not his rights, are considered. Take one insulated case, and if injustice is done, it would not be more injurious or flagrant, because others share the same fate. As it respects the rights of the petitioners, they cannot be entitled to higher consideration than citizens who have been, and will continue to be, subject to this power, not to injure but to pardon. Has this power been exercised improperly? Where is the complaint? None is heard. Why fear it at this moment? The Secretary of the Treasury is an officer of high character and responsibility; and as we are amenable to those who elect us, for a faithful discharge of our duty, he is equally accountable to the constituted authority of Government. No officer is exempt from this responsibility. But we place confidence where confidence is due. Who doubts the capacity of the Secretary? This is acknowledged. Who doubts his integrity? None. Where then is the fear? That he will not remit the forfeitures of the importers of British manufactures without qualification? This is not my fear. I do not wish it; and the Secretary has said he will not do it; and no wonder at the opposition of those who differ from him.

The argument for a reference might be closed here; but the objection arising principally from the extent of relief, and not from the nature of the power, the view of the Secretary of the Treasury is naturally involved in the discussion.

To consult what is due to equitable considerations, the manner in which the non-importation act has been violated must be a matter of examination. The Committee of Ways and Means was furnished with papers by those who represented the merchants in this case, which is a clear manifestation that they were not ignorant of the provisions of that law by which 20,000,000 of property has been forfeited to the United States. It contains, verbatim, that clause in the act of March 1, 1811, which sanctioned the President's proclamation of November 2, 1810, by reviving the non-importation part of the non-intercourse against Great Britain.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall declare the fact by proclamation; and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit, &c. And the restrictions imposed, or which may be imposed by virtue of the said act, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued."

From this provision in the statute, the President was made the sole judge of what revocation or modification of the British Orders in Council would justify a suspension of the non-importation act, which fact was to be declared by proclamation, which was to be the only evidence of the fact of such revocation or modification; and the restrictions imposed upon our commerce were to cease from the date of the President's proclamation, and not from the revocation of the British Orders in Council. In defiance of this knowledge, the shipments of British manufactures were made.

The importers not only anticipated what the President would do in consequence of the Order in Council of June 23d, but placed themselves in the character of judges for the people of the United States of what modification or revocation of the British orders, of 1807 and 1809, would justify a suspension of the non-importation act—thus attempting to arrest from the President the high power vested in him alone by act of Congress.

This course of measures was pursued by a hasty and precipitate importation of British manufactures, without waiting a reasonable time for the President's proclamation, from the date of which commercial restriction was to cease. Was this an innocent infraction of an existing law? What motive actuated? The prospect of gain—self-aggrandizement. The honor of the country was forgotten; the law considered a dead letter; and British aggressions overlooked.

It was a desire to come with their wares into an exhausted market—to enrich themselves—to out-run other merchants who waited for the administration of the law by the proper organ. The infraction of the law was not innocent. I will not say it was fraudulent. It was a violation with their eyes open to their own personal benefit. If the revocation of the British Orders in Council had been such as to have admitted of no doubt of the suspension of the non-importation act, the merchants were advised by their showing that it was illegal to make shipments until the emanation of the President's proclamation. It was not only prohibited to our citizens to make shipments; but to load their vessels with intent to ship before such proclamation, was a forfeiture of the goods. This gave notice to all, under what circumstances trade could be resumed, and placed the community upon an equality. In risking a voluntary infraction of law, the importers of British merchandise should have chosen a case less embarrassed than the British order of revocation. The conditions of the revocation are incompatible with the vital principles of our sovereignty and independence. 1. British armed vessels are to be admitted to the hospitalities of our waters and ports, without atonement or repentance for the insults and injuries received by our citizens in the vexations of the commerce, in the impressment of our seamen, and in the slaughter of our people. 2. The suspension of the non-importation act. 3. The right is positively claimed of resorting to the Orders in Council, as a measure of retaliation against France, whenever the British Ministry shall deem it expedient. Admit that they had a right from our promises to expect a compliance with the two first conditions, the third was surely an insult to our injured feelings, and declaring in so many words that the arbitrary principle of plundering our property on the high seas was a right which they had only relaxed until it was deemed expedient in the sight of our enemy to fix it upon us. It is unnecessary to hazard an opinion, as to the course which would have been pursued by the President under this insidious and disguised relaxation of the British Orders in Council—it is however evident that it was not a case favorable for the importing merchants to anticipate the views of the President in violation of law. This is not the only view which will enable us to consult equally equitable considerations and the public interest. The measure of non-importation must be examined. Without an inquiry into the merit of this act, the reasons are obvious why there should not be a voluntary and total violation of a positive statute with impunity, and more care should be taken not to give premiums to one part of the community to do that which in our legislative characters we refused to do. It is well known that Congress at the last session refused to repeal this non-importation act in whole or in part—and I am unwilling that the act should be repealed by force. I do not speak of hard cases. I speak of the ordinary trade from Great Britain. There is one class of importers entitled to consideration above all others—those who purchased their goods in the fall, 1810, before the non-importation act was revived by the President's proclamation of 2d November, or who had purchased their goods previous to the 2d of February, 1811, which closed the departure of vessels from British ports by the act of March, 1811. This may be considered innocent bona fide American trade, being American property, purchased before the restrictions were in operation, and the merchants being compelled to warehouse such goods at their own risk, until the late revocation of the British Orders in Council. The dilemma of this property was not produced by a voluntary act on the part of the purchaser. He obeyed the impulse of duty in storing away his goods, making a sacrifice rather than violate the laws of the country; and in addition to this reason for a distinction, and not less powerful, is that Congress did by law admit to entry all property shipped from British ports prior to the 2d February, 1811, although by the previous existing provision, forfeitures were incurred unless the vessel arrived within our ports before that period. To make a discrimination in those cases where it can be done is assuming the ground of equality. I was not unwilling at the last session to admit a partial suspension of the non-importation act, for the double purpose of relieving the bona fide American merchant who had his funds in Great Britain, and to prevent at that time internal taxation. This suspension was to be limited as to time, and restricted as to articles, which would have relieved us from impositions which have been lately enacted in the sale of certain articles, and the British manufacturers would not have been relieved from their great distress, nor would our own manufactures have suffered by the competition. Upon this subject I have not changed my opinion. I was at that time against a repeal of the non-importation act; at this time I am against any relaxation—nor did this partial relaxation which was attempted at the last session contemplate a direct trade with Great Britain. It was prohibited expressly. A total repeal was then attempted and failed; and no wonder those who have at all times advocated the abandonment of the non-importation act as a ruinous measure should advocate its repeal by actual violation—by force. So much has been suggested without regard to the merits of this measure of non importation. The non-importation act is a measure of redress against British aggression, and rigidly enforced it is a powerful weapon. It is not a system of the moment, nor was it adopted without due deliberation; nor has it been persevered in without absolute certainty of its efficacy and beneficial results. It might be traced to the Revolution; it might be called the offspring of that epoch, originating with wisdom, to which we are indebted for our high destiny as a free people. The Journals of the old Congress need not be consulted. Let the period of 1805 be called to recollection; that was an enviable period for the American patriot, when the importing and exporting merchants united in writing one hundred and forty pages in various memorials to Congress against the piratical conduct of British cruisers acting under British orders. It was an application of the rule of '56 to the commerce of the United States; a rule fundamentally wrong and the conduct under it the most atrocious. Plunder and piracy was the order of the day. Trade consecrated by public law subject to fluctuating decisions; rules of evidence disregarded; vessels and cargoes subject to the arbitrary discretion of English tribunals. The rule of '56 never was executed until 1801—then it was alternately enforced and abandoned—until the merchants rallied in the fall of 1805. In '56 it was the case of the Dutch carrying colonial produce the property of an enemy. It was not a question of security in cases of bona fide neutral property. This colonial trade had become lucrative; the wealth of our merchants was employed in purchasing colonial productions; brought to the United States, the direct trade being prohibited, the surplus was exported under the sanction of the most sacred and long established principles of the laws of nations, as well as the British admiralty courts. Under these sanctions, without notice, and with a motive to plunder, our rich cargoes spread over the face of every sea are swept from the ocean by British armed vessels.

Not satisfied with the regular trade of the American merchant, it has been periodically a prey to feed the hungry appetite of the British navy, and her cruisers. She destroys the commerce of her enemies; she plunders the commerce also of neutrals; and as our neutral and maritime rights have been important to our citizens by their enterprise and industry, and as they have promised us prosperity and wealth, in the same degree have they been subjects of British jealousy and outrage. The merchants were united in their complaints; Congress was urged to resistance; the Government was called upon to outstretch the right hand of its power; while the merchants were swearing upon the altar of eternal justice, that they would avenge the bleeding wounds of their common country. In New York the merchants, in their memorial, recommend permission to be given to the seamen to resist, with force of arms, in our own waters, British press gangs. The disgrace of submitting to plunder and outrage was felt. Ready to support the cause of the merchants, Congress obeyed their impressive call. Mr. Monroe reiterated the same complaint from Europe. Something must be done. The eighteenth of April, the partial non-importation act was adopted, to take effect the fifteenth of November following. Congress was not long deceived. Dismay seemed to succeed this display of zeal. Commercial sensibilities were blunted. Aggressions were more common; prospects were darkened; those who urged the nation to resistance were the first to condemn it. Commercial restriction with Great Britain was opposed, and, when war was declared, that war was opposed with fourfold violence—the alternative was submission. No cessation on the part of Great Britain of her hostile acts; they increased; no concession of rights, no atonement made. On the 22d December, 1807, an embargo was laid; which continued fourteen months, and was repealed by act of Congress of first March, 1809. The non-intercourse law continued about fourteen months, and expired with the end of the session in May, 1810. The first of May, 1810, before the close of the session, the act passed which authorized the President to revive the non-importation part of the non-intercourse, which was about to expire, upon certain contingencies. Accordingly, the 2d November, 1810, the non-importation was revived against Great Britain by proclamation, which continues in force. This is the history of our commercial restrictions.

While the people are fighting for commerce and free trade, I am unwilling to see any class of citizens carry on a trade with the enemy, and under license. It would be gross injustice to the other classes of the community, and it would induce the merchant to look to a foreign Government, and an enemy, for protection. The calamity of war is acknowledged. It has been resorted to as the least evil, and all must bear the calamity as it comes upon them, as our fathers did before us. The time has arrived when we must act with energy. The partial non-importation law was too weak; the embargo was too weak; the non-intercourse was too weak: these measures were weak, because the mercantile class of the people was strong; our weakness has originated from their strength. The partial non-importation law was suspended; the embargo was repealed in a moment of alarm; and the non-intercourse expired of itself. The strength of the non-importation is about to be tested; we are now to see whether we shall be driven from this ground. But the non-importation is a strong measure of redress. It has had this character with the British Ministry. When Mr. Fox was advised of the passage of the partial non-importation act, he seemed to be alarmed. After his death, his successors, Lords Holland and Auckland, made it the first act of their official duty with our Ministers in London to remonstrate against it. See the last letter written by Mr. Monroe before Mr. Pinkney united with him, and see the first letter received by them jointly. The same anxiety prevailed in the subsequent communications upon our subsequent restrictive measures.

The examination before the House of Commons in England of upwards of one hundred individuals of respectability, from more than thirty of the great manufacturing districts, and the remark of Mr. Brougham, place the subject in a most interesting point of view. The principal manufacturers, the proprietors, are represented as without capital; with stock on hand and no market; their funds exhausted, and ruin threatened; the laboring class of the people reduced to the most afflicting distress. Thousands are represented to be without employ; thousands upon half pay, and half allowance of food; thousands reduced to the brink of starvation; the home-market glutted, and the price of manufactures reduced. South America, Canada, and other places, had been substituted for the markets in the United States; and nothing but loss and disappointment had ensued; and, as the continent of Europe was closed against British manufactures, the United States alone could relieve the distress of this valuable class of people in Great Britain. The common and ordinary consumption of British manufactures in the United States of America is estimated at fifty millions of dollars. The pay for these goods is certain, and the market not liable to fluctuation. So great has been the importations of British manufactures from the first organization of this Government, that the proceeds of our export trade to every other part of the world has principally returned home through British channels. Great Britain has been the exchange for our commerce, and if not checked, our merchants will continue during war to augment their funds in Great Britain. The case under consideration furnishes another strong evidence of the effect of this measure. The 23d June, the Orders in Council were revoked; the 13th of July, information was received in Great Britain, that a declaration of war had passed the House of Representatives; on the 30th of July, the war was officially known. Notwithstanding this short period, upwards of twenty millions worth of British manufactures have been shipped to the United States, which falls far short of usual importations. For upwards of eighteen months, the exchange between the United States and Great Britain has been about twenty per cent. discount. Since the shipments of the late imported British goods, the exchange has sunk to fourteen per cent. discount. This is evidence of the relief occasioned by the late importations. Nor will we omit the statement of Mr. Russell, our Chargé des Affaires, a gentleman who has so distinguished himself in his correspondence with the British Government. He informs you that the Orders in Council were revoked to relieve the wants and distresses of the manufacturers of England, and not as an act of justice towards the United States.

Thus, sir, the operation of this measure upon the enemy has been considered. No doubt its operation at home will be examined. I am not afraid of this examination. We have been told, and we shall be told again, that this is a self-destroying system; that we injure ourselves more than we injure the enemy. We no doubt cloud the prospects of the exporting and importing merchants, and it has an indirect influence upon the prospects of others.

But we do not expect to be without clothes to wear or bread to eat, although this non-importation act may continue as to Great Britain. We hear complaints that the per centage of the merchant is curtailed. We do not, however, hear of thousands reduced to want and beggary. So far from it, as a general measure, the non-importation act is not injurious to the United States. Industry is augmented, extravagance is curtailed, independence is secured, and manufactures are completely protected. The documents which have been furnished to this House, and other correct sources of information, have given us a most flattering prospect of domestic manufactures.

The annual value of domestic manufactured articles, is estimated at an hundred and twenty millions of dollars:—Of cabinet ware, household furniture, and ship building, twenty millions; leather and manufactures of leather, saddles, harness, shoes, boots, &c., twenty millions annually; of woollen, cotton, and flaxen goods, forty millions. Two-thirds of the people of the United States are clothed with domestic manufactures. Two-thirds of the slavery, house, and table linen used, is made in the United States. Importation of cards prevented by Whittemore's machine.

Manufactures in the United States are equal to the consumption—1st. Of wood, and of which wood is the chief material; 2d. Leather, and the manufactures of leather; soap and candles; flax-seed oil, refined sugar, coarse earthenware, snuff, chocolate, mustard, &c.

Manufactures firmly established, some furnishing the greater, and all a considerable part of the consumption of the United States—First, iron and manufactures of iron; second, of cotton wool and flax; third, hats, paper, printing types, printed books, spirituous and malt liquors, manufactures of hemp, gunpowder, window glass, jewelry, and clocks, leads, straw bonnets, and hats, wax candles, paints, and colors, salt, copper, plated ware, calico printing, queens. earthen and glass ware, medical drugs and several chemical preparations. This calculation was made principally from materials collected by the Secretary of the Treasury in 1810. Since which time there has been a great augmentation of our manufacturing establishments. The want of capital is no longer felt.

The United States abound in the raw materials of these various manufactures, and as to the necessities of life no country can boast of equal abundance. From this view of the subject it might be urged that the United States has been injured in these late British importations, save a benefit arising from a revenue of five millions of dollars. Here a foundation is laid to destroy our dependence upon Great Britain. When that is destroyed we shall not have so much to fear from her jealousy. When the two nations are convinced that they can do without each other they will be better friends, and our distance will prevent future wars. Our exporters sell their cargoes of flour to the peninsula of Spain and purchase a bill of exchange upon Great Britain. The importer purchases this bill from the exporter, and ships to this country British manufactures. Here is dependence on our part. On the part of Great Britain she depends upon the markets of the United States to sell her manufactures and get a supply of the raw material to supply her work shops. This powerful class of British subjects, the manufacturers, prefer the markets of the United States to the markets of any other part of the globe, and the reason is obvious. In every conflict, therefore, between the two States, founded on British aggressions, this country may calculate perhaps too much upon their markets for British fabrics as an inducement on the part of Great Britain to abstain from further violence. Great Britain makes still stronger calculations upon the opposition in this country to measures of hostility. If the non-importation act should fail as a means of redress, this view gives some consolation, in the hope that if this state of things must continue it will convince the two Powers that they can live without each other. I flatter myself, that the United States would only feel a temporary evil, if from any necessity it was cut off from an intercourse with Great Britain never to be resumed—our resources are great, our wants can be supplied. I come lastly to consider the facts and the testimony in this case, and although I shall be bound to consider the statement of the merchants as interested parties, and the examination will prove it, still I shall say nothing to derogate from the high character, the great respectability, and the extensive information of those committees of merchants who have appeared before the Committee of Ways and Means. The testimony reported has only made out one side of the question. It would astonish those who are unacquainted with judicial proceedings, particularly in chancery, where individuals of the first and equal respectability contend for their rights, and each party, though equally zealous in his own behalf, make out very different and opposite cases. Here the judge leaves the statement of the parties and resorts to other testimony, either verbal or written. Indeed, sometimes the parties make statements contrary to the records of the courts, which is the highest species of evidence.

A chancellor, who had never adorned the bench of equity, would be still more astonished in cases brought for his adjudication. He would take up the bill of the complaint and read it—he would look at the party making the statement—he would acknowledge his respectability, his high standing, his unsuspected veracity—and, without further investigation, he would suppose no doubt could exist as to the justice of the claim, and would feel a disposition forthwith to enter a decree against the defendant. But, when his duty compelled him to travel over the statement of the defendant, equally respectable, equally creditable, equally honorable, he would immediately discover that he had only viewed one side of the question. His mind would immediately be balanced, and he would call for other testimony to make out the cases—and what is still more wonderful, neither party in their statement would so contradict each other as to injure the reputation of the other. So powerful is self-interest—so blind to the rights of others—the mind seems to possess magical powers to deceive itself, without being conscious of it. With these remarks, I turn to the report, 19th page, where the Committee of Merchants state that the average of the impost duties, as calculated at the custom-house, amount to 33½ per cent. on the prime cost of goods; on crockery and glass ware, hard ware, plated ware, silks, millinery, &c., 50 per cent. Here we have the record as a guide as to duties—and it was my duty to descend to that record and consult its pages.

The duties are divided in denomination into specific and ad valorem duties. Few articles pay specific duties—the great fund of revenue arises from ad valorem duties. These duties may be classed according to these rates. Previous to a declaration of war, the peace duties were, 1st. 12½, 15, and 20 per cent.; to these were added 2½ per cent. the Mediterranean fund. Doubled, since war, they stand—first class, 25 per cent.; add Mediterranean duty, 2½=7½;—second class, 30 per cent.; add the Mediterranean duty 2½=32½;—third class, 40 per cent.; add the Mediterranean duty 2½=42½.

The rates of ad valorem duties are fixed by law. The calculation is made by adding 20 per cent. upon the prime cost of all goods imported from the Cape of Good Hope or beyond. 10 per cent. upon the actual cost from any other place, including all charges which precede the shipment, commissions, outside packages, and insurance excepted. The prime cost: we will take the round sum of £100, and make the calculated export duties from Great Britain and inland charges, £6, to be added to prime cost=106; to this sum add 10 per cent. £10 12. The amount upon which duty, £116 12, is calculated for every £100 prime cost.

This calculation is not an arbitrary one. It is consistent with the law and the practice of the Treasury, only in most cases the Treasury does not add as much as 6 per cent. to the prime cost, as I have done in this case. Indeed, I have now two original invoices and a bill of lading, to prove that the ordinary charges which are added to the prime cost, and upon which the duty is calculated, does not amount to 6 per cent. Upon every £100 only prime cost, therefore, the charges and the 10 per cent. will make it £116.

DECEMBER, 1812.

1st. The duty of  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on £116 would be 32 per cent. on £100.

2d. The duty of  $32\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on £116 would be 38 per cent. on £100.

3d. The duty of  $42\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on £116 would be  $49\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on £100.

It is necessary to examine and find out the proportions of the importations on articles which pay these three rates of duty, of  $27\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $32\frac{1}{2}$ , and  $42\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. upon prime cost, and the addition of £6 to each £100, according to the calculation at the custom-house; or, in other words, the articles paying upon the prime cost 32 per cent., 38 per cent., and  $49\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Hollow glass ware, carriages, and parts of carriages, alone pay  $49\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Hard ware, millinery, leather, and manufactures of leather, china, crockery, &c., pay 38 per cent. All other goods, principally wool, silk, cotton, flax, hemp, &c., pay only 32 per cent. Although the bulk of these articles paying the last estimated rate of duties, are enumerated by the Committee of Merchants from New York as paying 50 per cent.—making an average difference of about 17 per cent., which, taken from the gross amount of the charges which they stated amounted to 60 per cent. and upwards, will give them a profit of 17 per cent., more than was calculated. But I proceed with my calculation to find out the average of the duty upon importations into the United States. This can be done only by resorting to the annual reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury, which will give the amount of articles paying the three rates of ad valorem duty. But little time has been given, and I have commenced with the year 1804 up to the year 1810, both years inclusive:

The result of seven years gives us 264 millions' worth of importations, by adding a fraction of a million in each case for sake of round numbers.

Of that vast amount of 264 millions, three millions has paid  $49\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. duty; 48 millions has paid 38 per cent., and 113 millions has paid the lowest per cent. upon the prime cost, 32 per cent. To get hold of the average duty we must not take the duties alone, add them together and then divide by three; we must also take into the calulation the amount of articles paying the different rates of duty. The experiment has been made of the two last years, and of the three last years. The average duty upon the whole importations would be less than  $33\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Therefore, the great bulk of the articles, and in fact all of the articles enumerated by the committee of New York, as paying 50 per cent. duty upon the prime cost, pay only 38 and 32, except hollow glass ware, and the average duty as calculated at the custom-house upon annual importations does not amount to  $33\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. So much for the first fact, which is proven variant from the understanding of the New York committee, by the laws of the land, the custom-house calculations, and mathematical demonstration. We will now pass to another allegation in the reported statement. It seems as if one of the New York committee stated that the greater part of the late importations of British manufactures were purchased in the Fall of 1819, and previous to 2d of February, 1811, the period when the non-importation commenced its operation. This statement was not made upon positive facts. It was a belief, an opinion expressed, and, as will appear, unnecessarily and too strongly expressed. These were the cases most entitled to consideration—and the want of evidence to discriminate, is a reason additional why we should refer this subject to some tribunal for examination, and you must give it to the Secretary of the Treasury, or you must create a new tribunal. The statement under consideration does not admit of arithmetical demonstration. We must resort to circumstantial and such positive evidence as we have on this point, and although it may not be sufficient to say what amount of goods lately imported were purchased and on American account and risk prior to the 2d of February, 1811, there is violent presumptive evidence to overthrow the opinion of the member of the New York committee, that the greater part was purchased.

The late importations admit of classification as to the time of purchase, as to the time of shipment, and as to the ownership of the property. As to the time of purchase: That which was purchased previous to February, 1811; that which was purchased after 2d February, and previous to the revocation of the British Orders in Council of 23d of June, 1812; and purchases made after a revocation of the British Orders in Council. As to shipments, vessels which left British ports for the United States before a knowledge of the declaration of war, and vessels which sailed after that knowledge. As to the ownership, 1st. That which was purchased either on credit or with prompt payment by American citizens, and shipped on American account. 2d. Goods shipped by British merchants to order and on British risk and British account until delivered to the American merchant in this country. I have already produced papers showing such a case, where the invoices, the bill of lading and the mercantile letter enclosed to a friend who was directed to deliver over the goods to a third person, upon the contingency of his being in solvent circumstances. 3d. British property. There is no evidence to determine precisely the quantity of goods purchased at those different periods, but there are circumstances to establish the fact that a very small portion indeed was purchased prior to the 2d of February, 1811.

From an examination of custom-house returns it will appear that from ten to fifteen million of dollars worth of British merchandise was shipped into the United States previous to the 2d of February, 1811, and which was admitted to entry and exempted from forfeiture in consequence of the provisions of the act of March, 1811, which was intended to embrace those very cases. Independent of this, it was well known that application would be made to Congress for such a relaxation of the non-importation act.

There were other weighty inducements to the merchant to get home his property. He had paid the usual prices. The non-importation was to commence its operation on the 2d February, 1811; there was no prospect of a speedy termination of our differences with Great Britain; the exhausted markets of the United States offered a certain pledge of profit. Under these circumstances it is likely that ten million dollars worth of the late importations were purchased, paid for, put into warehouses, and there remained until 23d June, 1812? The enterprising and bold character of the merchant forbids such a supposition. Their conduct in general, I do not speak in particular, has not been timid, more especially when they have only come into contact with the commercial restrictions of the United States. This is not the only circumstance. We have it from the statement of Mr. Russell, that the revocation of the British Orders in Council was not an act of justice towards the United States, but as a relief to her numerous suffering and ruined manufacturers, who had stated that they had conditional orders from American merchants for vast quantities of goods as soon as the Orders in Council were revoked. Mr. Russell also states, that, after the revocation of the Orders in Council, the agents of American merchants were extremely active in making investments in British manufactures. It is a fact acknowledged that the state of exchange was affected by it—it fell from upwards of 20 to 14 or 15 per cent.—and that there was also a rise in the price of manufactures. Mr. Russell concludes with stating it as his opinion, that a very small portion of the late importations was purchased prior to February 2d, 1811. I have examined this fact, not as a judge or an advocate, but with a view to convince the committee of the necessity of a reference of this subject. The next fact I shall take up relates to the rate of profit, and here again we must have recourse to the best evidence in our power, and not the best the nature of the case will admit. The petitioners admit that they will make a handsome profit if their bonds should not be forfeited. If they should escape by a total remission of the forfeitures incurred, this handsome profit they allege will be from 5 to 10 per cent. above ordinary profit, and not including the discount in the rate of exchange between the United States and Great Britain. It is alleged that the rate of exchange ought not to be calculated as an extra profit, because within ten years it will balance itself. It is true that in ordinary times, the exchange will sometimes be above par, and sometimes below par, so as not to make any material profit or loss within ten or any given numbers of years. But, previous to the year 1811, for twenty years the discount has never been greater than ten per cent.—during the year 1811 it was 20 per cent. and upwards. The petitioners say from 10 to 23. Taking all the information I have read on this subject, the discount in some cases has been 28 per cent. If the petitioners will not call this discount a profit, I cannot help it, nor is it less true that the discount puts into their pockets so much money. I am not compelled to disbelieve my own senses; and if I see a bill of exchange purchased at a discount of 20 per cent., which is equal in value to its nominal amount, in vain may the purchaser say he makes no calculation of profit from such a speculation. He makes his twenty per cent. discount. The same advantage accrues to the exporter of produce to the Peninsula. The bills on England are invested in British manufactures to prevent a loss of 20 per cent. I have had reference to the reports annually made by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to ascertain the fluctuations of exchange.

A recurrence to this annual report, where the Government has made great annual purchases of bills on England with a view of paying the public debt in Europe, confirms the fact stated by the petitioners, that exchange was never known before to be more than ten per cent. discount, and that within ten years the balance is equal in ordinary times.

In 1804 exchange was from par to 2½ per cent advance, average 1½; 1805, exchange was from par to 4 per cent. discount, average 3; 1806, at par; 1807, from 1 per cent. to 3 discount, average 2; 1808, from 3 to 6½ advance, average 4½; 1809, from 1 to 4 advance, average 2½; 1810, from 2 to 5 discount, average 3½.

The opportunity of the seven years enumerated has alone been afforded for the want of time, which leaves a balance of one and a half per cent. in favor of the advance.

In 1811 from fifteen to twenty-five per cent., average twenty, from the best information, leaving on the side of discount eighteen and a half per cent. In 1812 from ten to twenty, average fifteen per cent., add to eighteen and a half makes thirty-three and one-half per cent., add to this the depression of British manufactures, from five to ten per cent. on an average since February 2, 1811. I have made these remarks and calculations, because the subject of profit was involved, not to make out a case against the merchants, but with a view of showing the necessity of referring them to the Secretary of the Treasury, where ample justice will be done them. If I am permitted to wander from the record, and I do not feel myself confined to any particular source of information, I would give a calculation which would establish the extra profit of the importer at twenty per cent. above the usual profit. I would take the sales in Baltimore for £100 sterling in ordinary times say £240 currency, this year £300; the difference will be £60; converted into sterling it is £36 sterling on the £100; deduct the double duty £16, leaves £20 per cent. above ordinary profit. I will not venture to say what extra profit has been and will be made; it is not necessary to hazard the amount. I have established the point of a very considerable extra profit. The importers will not agree that they have made a great extra profit; they do not, however, deny the fact that the people have been compelled to pay the enormous high prices complained of. They say the jobbers, in other words the speculators and the retail merchants, have made these profits, but principally the jobbers. There would be no difficulty in procuring the testimony of retailers as to enormous prices paid to importers, and I presume the jobbers would not agree that they alone had imposed upon the people.

A variety of letters have been received by members and read as evidence, and ex parte affidavits, making out a better case for the merchants than they made for themselves. To read these letters and affidavits we might conclude that so far from any profit being derived from the late importations, that it had been really a losing business. I have seen several letters on the other side of the question; I could procure one from my friend from Pennsylvania, now to my right, another from a gentleman from Maryland, and I have in my hand one from the collector of Norfolk, all of which letters go to prove the great and exorbitant prices of goods obtained by importers, sufficient to cover their bonds. [Here the collector's letter was read.] But, sir, I have not sought testimony to make out a case, as if judgment was to be pronounced, or volumes might have been procured. What I have obtained has been a voluntary offering from respectable sources. As to letters in favor of the merchants, as many might be obtained against the declaration of war, if it was supposed they would be read in this body, to govern their decision. It has given me no pleasure to have been compelled to present this subject, as duty has compelled me. The situation in which I am placed is an invidious one, but called upon by duty, and obeying that solemn call upon a subject of so much magnitude, while I derive consolation in not having wantonly injured the feelings of the parties concerned, or those who differ from me in sentiment, I feel indifferent as to the opinion others may entertain of this policy, nor do I court the good opinion of any man further than it may be bottomed upon conscientious principles and correctness of conduct. Were I to consult my own feelings I might have remained silent. It may be thought by some that no part of the merchant's bonds should be exacted; that this great community should give up what is really due to them to those who have violated the law. The body politic—this great personage—has no identity but in its operation. It is not tangible, has no form to present itself to your view, to address your passions, to cloud your judgment, to weave itself into your tender mercies. But it is not less my duty as a representative of this great community not to abandon what I consider its most essential rights. I have nothing to disguise on this subject. This community, which has been taxed by these importers of British merchandise, is involved in difficulty, in a war which must continue until the present Ministry in England shall lose their power, or until the Republican party in the United States shall be turned out of their places. While this is the case, I am unwilling to fix upon them internal taxation until it become indispensable, nor to permit any portion of themselves to monopolize advantages without an equivalent. If the trading part of the community would not be satisfied with the measures of the Government, I would withdraw their capital from a disgraceful traffic with a foreign Power at war with their country; the war would be of short duration, and the people would pay any taxes you would fix upon them without a murmur. But when the agricultural and manufacturing part of our community have taken up the sword for commerce, and those immediately engaged in commerce opposing the war, they will not be willing to be taxed by that class of this people, and then taxed to carry on the war. In speaking of the opposition to the war, I do not intend to include many illustrious exceptions in the mercantile class of the community; but they will acknowledge that such is the fact generally, no matter what the cause, such is the unfortunate situation of the country; nor will one of them deny, that if we were now obliged to give up the conflict with Great Britain, our humiliation would be complete, and our independence at the mercy of the British Monarchy. Such has been the advances of the President towards a termination of the war, that if the Federalists were in power to-morrow they would not dare to give up the principle of impressment to Great Britain, unless they thought the people were ripe for monarchy. I have not said this because I think cases of individual justice or liberality should go by favor, and according to political tenets; no, sir, I have given testimony in this body, that party considerations do not govern me in cases of individual justice, nor in cases of liberality. I adduce it for the purpose of saying, the petitioners are not entitled to a total remission of the bonds, nor are they especially entitled to the mercy of this Government. Notwithstanding this, I am as unwilling to ruin the merchants as I am to abandon totally the just rights of this community. I am induced to vote for this reference, because the Secretary has said that he will not exact the whole of the bonds, nor will he remit them without condition. He will remit one-half; before the other is remitted, he will demand an equivalent for the extra profit which the importers have made. Why demand it? Because it is due to the non-importation act; because the petitioners have enjoyed exclusive privileges and these exclusive privileges have levied a tax upon the people. Who is, then, prepared to abandon this right of the community? Who is ready to tax them doubly, not on account of the war, but because we did not keep for them that money which was their due? I know, sir, upon questions of this kind we are called the friends and the enemies of commerce; and I have no doubt I am entitled to the latter denomination in the opinion of some. If, sir, to contend for the rights of this community even against great importing merchants is anti-commercial, I am that man. If, sir, to refuse to give up the non-importation act, and even to refuse to let merchants violate existing laws with impunity be anti-commercial, I am that man. If refusing to favor the merchants at the expense of the agricultural, and manufacturing, and laboring portion of the community, be inimical to commerce, I am the man. But, sir, if a willingness to expend the last of our treasure, and the last drop of our blood, for the neutral rights of the United States, will entitle me to be styled the friend of commerce, then I am entitled to this honorable appellation. If a determination never to give up the war, rather than permit our seamen to be impressed, and made slaves in the service of Great Britain, entitles any man to be considered the friend of commerce, then I am among the favored few. If, in fine, an anxious desire to place farmers, mechanics, and manufacturers on an equality, will shield any man from the odium of being unfriendly to commerce, then am I shielded. But, determined to discharge my duty at every hazard, I am not anxious where I shall be assigned by those who call themselves the exclusive friends of commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL followed Mr. JOHNSON in debate. He said he did not rise so much with the intention of making a reply to the learned and eloquent gentleman who had just taken his seat, as to introduce a new proposition to the consideration of the Committee, for the purpose of unfolding which he asked the indulgence of a few remarks.

He said he was dissatisfied with the report of the standing committee of Ways and Means for two reasons: the first, in point of substance, that it did not provide any relief for the petitioners; and the second, that, instead of containing a sentiment or opinion couched in positive terms, it was expressed in negative language. For the House is told "that it is inexpedient to legislate on this subject," and that the petitions of the merchants, with the accompanying documents, ought to be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. M. declared himself to be of a very different opinion. In this he was not singular, for, if he construed aright the Executive Message of the 4th November, it was plain that the President of the United States believed it to be worthy of Congressional deliberation. In his communication he informs us that a considerable number of vessels, which were in England when the revocation of the Orders in Council by the Prince Regent took place, were freighted with British merchandise and despatched to our country, under an expectation, which turned out to be erroneous, that the non-importation act would immediately be rescinded. It did not appear proper in the judgment of the Executive, on unforeseen cases of such magnitude, to exercise the ordinary powers vested in the Treasury Department to mitigate forfeitures, without previously affording to Congress an opportunity of making on the subject such provision as they may think proper, hoping that in any decision they may make they will equally consult what is due to equitable considerations and the public interest.

Upon this expression of the President's mind, sir, this House has already acted, by referring it to one of the standing committees, and now this committee comes forward with a recommendation that the House should do nothing in the premises, and thereby declines to aid the officers of the Treasury and revenue departments, in such a weighty and perplexing occurrence.

But my desire to act upon this occasion and extend a friendly hand to the Executive, is confirmed by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. In his letter to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, he informs him, that of the forfeitures which have accrued, one half is by law vested in the custom-house officers or informers, and the other half in the United States. The power to remit the share belonging to the United States and to all other persons, in whole and in part, and on such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and just, is indeed reposed by law already in that high and responsible officer. But considering, as he tells us, the magnitude and unforeseen nature of the case, it was thought proper not to exercise that authority until Congress should deliberate upon it, and prescribe, if they think proper, a course of proceeding. Thereupon, all the petitions already received remain in a state of suspense, and, for the purpose of avoiding an unnecessary accumulation of cost, the petitioners or sufferers have been mostly advised to withhold their applications until the decision of Congress should be ascertained.

According to my conception of the matter, this business is fairly before us for our action as legislators. We shall be worthily employed in deciding upon it favorably here, and not exhibit the spectacle of a sport at political battledore between the Legislature and the Executive, who toss the great question of the petitioners backward and forward like the shuttlecock.

Believing, thus, the matter to be completely before us, from the President's recommendation, from the Secretary's notice, from the Chairman's report, and from the respect due to memorializing citizens themselves, I am desirous of showing why I think a measure of mercy and favor ought to be shown. And I shall arrange the observations appertaining to my present purpose under two heads: 1st. The equity of the case; and 2dly. Its policy.

H. OF R.

On the equitable view of this case, I beg the attention of the Committee to the proceedings of our Government for a few years, relative to its commercial relations with Europe. After various misunderstandings and quarrels, concerning the rights of our citizens on the high seas, the privileges of neutral nations, and the increasing insolence and violence of the belligerents, Congress concluded it wise to withdraw from the scene of contention, and an embargo without limitation was enjoined upon our people late in 1807. This restriction was borne with almost unexampled firmness until March, 1809; a term of about fourteen months. It then became too irksome for a busy and commercial nation. The murmurs and discontents were too vehement to be resisted; and that plan, which, if it had been possible to have persisted in it, would have carried us triumphantly through our difficulties, was abandoned from necessity—and that necessity arose from a want of power in the Government to enforce it.

On the repeal of this was enacted the non-intercourse law against France and Great Britain; to which succeeded the memorable statute of May, 1810. This latter I ever considered as an unfortunate law for us; because it undertook to perform by an act of the Legislature what strictly and rightfully belonged to the treaty-making function of the President. By that statute we bound ourselves hand and foot, and in that condition presented ourselves to the unjust and the contemptuous belligerents to be untied.

By this we made a voluntary stipulation with the Power that sways the Continent of Europe, and that which rules the Ocean, that if either of them would so revoke his Orders in Council and decrees before March, 1811, as that they should cease to violate our neutral commerce, and the other nation should not, within three months thereafter, so revoke or modify her edicts, the provision of the act to interdict commercial intercourse, should be enforced against the Power so refusing or neglecting, after the expiration of three months from the date of the President's proclamation, as directed by law.

On this overture France acted, but in a manner so obscure and equivocal, that disputes arose concerning its reality. Our Government, however, considered the revocation serious and real; and the fact was officially announced accordingly. This brings us, sir, to November, 1810, the era from which we are to date the commencement of the three months allowed for England to act. We well remember that time, when month after month rolled away in anxious expectation, and at length the February of 1811 came; but without a corresponding overture on the part of the British Government.

Faithful then to its engagement, Congress passed the act supplementary to the act of May, 1810; and in March, 1811, and not until then, declared the provisions of the non-importation to be in operation against Great Britain only. But in this it will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, there was a salvo for all American vessels, and all merchandise owned by American citizens imported in such vessels as should have departed from a British port prior to the second day of February, 1811; and by this enlargement of the right to import, much merchandise was introduced, which would have been excluded, had the time been limited to arrivals on that day into a port of the United States. But it was at the same time equally clear, that this extension favored the man of bold adventure, rather than the respectable observer of his country's laws; and that a large part of those who were the best entitled to that remedial provision, were totally and unavoidably excluded from its benefits. In this way things progressed until the 18th June, when war was declared.

In the mean time, however, the British Government, availing itself of the regulations of our statute, did, on the same month, and without a knowledge of our law, revoke also, ostensibly, its obnoxious edicts. This revocation, though not satisfactory to the extent we hoped and wished, was nevertheless of such a character that I am bound to believe it would have kept amicable relations alive, and continued the commercial intercourse going, if the declaration of war had not intervened. I say, Mr. Chairman, if the act of the Prince Regent had been promulgated before the nation proclaimed hostilities, my belief is, we should not have measured swords with Great Britain at this time.

There can be no doubt that the British Government had a right to do as they did. Our statute gave them the full permission. What was the consequence? Why, sir, all classes of persons, high and low, gentle and simple, active and speculative, believed that the very thing was done, which our Government had sought. Every person holding funds in England, or possessing merchandise there, took measures for bringing them home. Yet, not satisfied with the universal impression, the merchants consulted the gentleman, who acted as Chargé d'Affaires for the country at the Court of St. James. And this exalted officer advised them without scruple to send home their property. This counsel seems to have been given under a full persuasion, that the penal and prohibitory statute would be annulled by the President, the moment the Prince Regent's declaration should be officially made known to him.

War had in the meanwhile been declared, and the Executive was thereby incapacitated to act. Yet, I appeal to the honorable and equitable feelings of this Committee to determine, whether the well-meaning and law-observing shippers, on this occasion, did not act as I and you, Mr. Chairman, and every other man of consideration and reflection, would have acted under similar circumstances?

I come, secondly, to the policy of granting relief to the petitioners. As I mean merely to introduce a proposition, and not to enter into a detailed argument, I shall be very brief.

The gentleman who preceded me has passed some severe strictures upon the mercantile character. I would wish him to retract or reconsider a part, at least, of his remarks. Merchants, I would have him to understand, are very much like other classes of society. They are governed by the same feelings, and actuated by the like principles. In some, the selfish disposition may predominate over the social, but even in such cases, the merchant does but resemble the farmer, the manufacturer, and the other classes of mankind. To say the most and the worst of them, they are very much like their neighbors.

The merchants have brought to the United States, say eighteen or twenty millions of property. This I admit to have been done against the letter of the law. When sinning, I am one who do not think that on this account they have sinned beyond forgiveness. No such thing. There is an equity of redemption held out to them, which may be exercised on the present occasion. And I hope Congress will conduct like a court of chancery its saving and interposing grace. I was one of those who during the last session was desirous of calling home the property of citizens abroad, as a war measure. I believed that the nation would thereby be strengthened; the individuals would get their property, and the Treasury a good store of revenue. Thus the private citizen and the public revenue would grow strong together, and by one and the same act. That measure, however, was thwarted at the time, and the permission to import was refused.

Now, sir, what has happened? Exactly that which might have been foreseen, to wit: that if you would not legitimate the importations, they would be made without your leave, and under such peculiar and imperative circumstances, that you must in conscience as well as in equity and policy yield to their force.

In urging the policy of extending mercy in this case, I beg you to look at the course of trade; we send freely abroad the products of our soil, although we feel a moral conviction that the greater part of the proceeds will centre in England, the emporium of the commercial world. It is perfectly well understood that Spain and Portugal cannot pay us either in specie or produce for the breadstuffs and other articles of human sustenance which we send to Cadiz and Lisbon, and that these exports are paid for to a great extent in bills upon London.

Consider, too, that, by several solemn votes of this session, we have refused to inhibit the exportation of grain. The motion made originally by the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. HARRER) and repeated since by the gentleman from Virginia, to keep our flour and meal at home to feed our own seamen, soldiers, and citizens, has been sturdily negatived. If then we export, I suppose it is intended to bring back the returns in a permitted and possible course of trade, for really I am not patriotic enough to make a gift of these valuable cargoes, either to the belligerents or to neutrals.

Again, sir, it may be questioned whether we ought to be excessively angry, at an event which has brought near twenty millions of property to the country, and six millions of dollars into the Treasury. This is in my estimation a fortunate and desirable event. The eastern breezes have floated it like a waif upon our shores, infinitely more precious, incalculably more valuable than a royal fish. I am willing to take the boon and make the most of it. A good prize in the lottery, however unexpected, is not the less a prize.

Besides, we have had the advantage, from these seasonable supplies, to clothe ourselves and our troops, and prepare one and all the better for encountering the inclement season, and carrying on the campaigns against the enemy in the North. The coatings, blankets, and coarser woollens, as the public agents inform us, have brought good prices to the owners, in consequence of the competition between the governmental commissaries and the private purchasers.

In this inquiry, it should all along be recollected, that our non-importation law is already and in fact defeated. Whatever inconvenience it was intended the enemy should feel and endure, by our refusal to receive his manufactures and merchandise, is, so far as the present importations go, frustrated. The deed is done. And the question is, not whether the foreign productions shall be admitted, but how, since they are already among us, the forfeitures and penalties to which they gave rise shall be disposed of. And, in this situation of the business, I for one am willing to act with lenity.

The circumstances of the petitioners are so pressing and peculiar, that I am totally averse to the Shylock severity of demanding strictly the pound of flesh. Remission and forgiveness seem to me to be preferable; and they will evince a magnanimity well worthy of our national character. In such conduct too there will be a conciliatory spirit, which will soothe and win the hearts of the memorialists and their friends. They cannot fail to love a Government which gives them such proofs of generosity. And thus we may calculate that one of the consequences of moderation in the case before us will be a strong, an undivided, and a hearty concurrence of these, with the other classes of our citizens, in giving money, supplies, and vigor, to the war we are waging for the vindication of our rights.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, stated summarily a few of the reasons which incline me to believe it will be both equitable and politic to look with a favorable eye upon the applicants at the bar. Yet, as I did not rise to enter now into a minute discussion, but merely to offer some general observations for the purpose of introducing a proposition—I move, without proceeding further, as an amendment to the resolve reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to strike out the whole after the word Resolved, and to insert in lieu thereof, the following words; “as the sense of this Committee, that the forfeitures and penalties incurred by those citizens of the United States who have given bonds for merchandise imported on their own account, and in American vessels, from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, since the 23d day of June last, ought to be remitted.”

FRIDAY, December 4.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of James Anderson; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making an appropriation to defray expenses incurred, under an act, entitled "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MERCHANTS' BONDS

The House resolved itself again into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject.

After considerable conversation, it was decided by the Committee, against the decision of the Chairman, (Mr. BASSETT,) that the amendment yesterday proposed, by Mr. MITCHELL, was in the nature of a substitute to the original proposition, and was therefore not in order.

The question, of course, recurred on the resolution reported by the Committee.

Mr. CHEVES rose.—He said he never rose to address the House with so much embarrassment as at this time. I feel anxious, said he, on the subject now before you, for the interests of those who present themselves as petitioners at your bar; for the principles of free government which I consider involved in the question to be decided; for the fate of that party connexion with which I am associated; and for the honor of Government, which I would preserve inviolate. I believe, sir, that no question has ever been presented to our consideration more extraordinary in its nature, and more important in its consequences. It has none of those marked characteristics which have heretofore distinguished legislation. It is at once legislation, and avoiding legislation; at once declining to express the opinion of the Legislature, and, in effect, delegating legislative power to decide on a question involving property to the amount of not less than forty millions—as I understand, said he, it will be contended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is not an ordinary act of legislation; it is an experiment new, and before unheard of. It is an experiment on free government, on the forbearance and attachment of a large class of the people. It is a question of legislation, and yet it is only a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman from Kentucky says, with his usual fairness and candor, it is to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise functions on this important case, which, he admits, were invested in him for minor purposes. But is this power to be exercised by the Secretary according to his own judgment? No, sir; the gentleman tells you without disguise he has secured his opinion; he knows the course he will pursue, and is, therefore, in favor of a reference of the subject to him. It is, then, an act of legislation we are called on to perform, and yet, it does not present to the country the grounds on which we act. Is it not a new and extraordinary proposition, to delegate to an individual a great portion of legislative power—to put into his hands the fate of a great portion of the capital of our merchants? Has such an act of legislation ever before characterized a free Government? I tremble for the consequences which will follow its adoption. It will shake the party with which I am connected from either extreme of the continent to its centre. It will alienate a part of them. It will show that a policy exists adverse to their interests, which first made its appearance in exclusive double duties; now, in an exaction of a part of the proceeds of honorable enterprise, and, I fear, will be followed by other acts of a similar kind. Sir, I repeat, I tremble for the consequences. Gentlemen must pardon me when I say we are prone to acts which "make the angels weep." How, otherwise, can we account for the course of policy which now prevails? Is it possible sir, that I, who represent persons deeply interested in the commerce of this country, can consent to unite in a decision of this nature? I wish to expostulate with gentlemen—to throw myself into their confidence—to induce them to believe I am in earnest. I am, sir. If I hope for honor or reputation in public life, I must acquire it with those who compose the majority in this House. Rise with them I may, fall with them I must. I am privileged, then, to expostulate with them, and to say that this is one of the most extraordinary acts ever presented to a legislative body for its sanction.

What is the state of the law in relation to the subject before us? It is alleged that the Secretary of the Treasury has full power over the subject, and that the Legislature has not; and, therefore, it ought to be referred to his consideration. It is admitted that our powers extend to one moiety of the penalty, but it is suggested as doubtful whether they extend to the other. But, sir, I have no doubt on the subject. I have examined it, and from the little knowledge I possess of the rules of construction, I say there is a power in the Legislature to remit the whole. I submit to those learned in the law if this be not the true construction. It is distinguished from those cases in which it is said the King has not the power to remit. It is to be recovered for the United States in the name of their officers, and it is only in the event of absolute recovery that the property becomes subject to the provisions of the act. What doubt can there be on the subject? If, then, we possess the power to remit, as I believe we do, why shall we transfer it? But, if the power be not complete, what excuse can be found for delegating the portion of it which we do possess? If it be an act of justice to remit these penalties, why put in the power of any individual, however high his standing, to pursue a different course? It is our duty not to commit the rights of our constituents to any individual. I admit the character of the officer to whom it is proposed to delegate this power to be as high and unexceptionable as that of any officer in the Government; but, admitting this, I say it is a prostration of the rights of our constituents to submit them to his arbitration. I saw one of the petitioners when the report was first stated to him. His exclamation was not, "Am I to be subjected to these penalties?" but, "Am I to supplicate any individual in the community for my just rights?" These feelings did him honor, sir. They are such as the citizen should feel. But they are all prostrate, all forgotten, in the proposition before you.

But it is said there are a variety of cases, and it is impossible the Legislature should decide on them correctly; and they must, therefore, be referred to this gentleman, (the Secretary of the Treasury,) who has the means and capacity to decide on them. I deny that he has. It is a subject on which an act of grace ought to be passed by the Legislature. No human tribunal could do justice by minute and particular discrimination to all concerned. How is the Secretary of the Treasury more capable than this House? There are hundreds of cases. Is he to make a separate decision on each—to determine on the fraudulent and other cases, and their relative merit? Is he, in making such decisions, to receive evidence ex parte, or as a court of justice? Incumbered as he is by the other functions of his office, he must at last do what you must do, if he attempt to discriminate, adopt general principles of discrimination. And will you declare yourselves less capable than him thus to decide? A discrimination, such as is contemplated by the report, cannot be carried into effect but by the most humiliating compromise of justice on the part of the Government—of right on the part of the citizen. It must be a matter of conjecture. It cannot be a decision founded on investigation and the dictates of reason. You gain nothing, therefore, by the proposed reference. But, it is still said, as the cases of these petitioners present several classes, it is impossible for the Legislature to discriminate. I say it is quite possible, sir, to discriminate as far as it is important to do so. It is possible to leave all the cases to the decision of a judicial tribunal of the country, and for the Legislature to do what the Legislature of a free people ought to do—to grant your suffering citizens an act of grace. It is in your power to take such a course as shall distinguish between cases of your own citizens and your enemies, and this will be done by the resolution which I shall propose, if I have an opportunity of submitting it, which is as follows:

"Resolved, On viewing all the facts which have been presented, and considering them in connexion with the proper policy of a just, free, enlightened, and consequently lenient Government, under the circumstances of this country at this crisis, that, in all fair cases of bona fide American property, the penalties and forfeitures incurred by the late importers of British manufactures be unconditionally remitted."

Do you wish, sir, that the citizens who fairly hold their property should be mulcted for accidental violation of your law? No man desires it. In the resolution which I propose to offer, bona fide American property will be exempted and enemies' property, shipped as such, will be liable to forfeiture according to the law of the land and the policy of the Government, and this is surely the course which ought to be pursued.

The difficulties, then, which have been made to cover this question disappear; the advantages with which the course recommended by the committee has been clothed, appear not to exist; and the real question before us is, whether we will sacrifice so much of the property of our fellow-citizens as is involved in this decision, or whether we will, by an act of grace and liberality, discharge them from their bonds.

In the examination of this question gentlemen have assailed the testimony connected with this report. They have said it is the testimony of interested persons; that all interested persons are casuists, in their own cases; and that the witnesses have been so in the present case. The moral honor or integrity of the witnesses has not been impeached. The gentleman from Kentucky, with his characteristic liberality, has spared them such imputations, and, though it was not more than justice to them, I thank him for it. But is not this testimony such as is always received by a Legislative body? The gentleman, with an air of triumph, alluded to the testimony taken before the House of Commons in relation to the Orders in Council. Was that testimony taken on oath? I believe not, sir; it was, too, the testimony of persons, as the gentleman himself says, who saw ruin staring them in the face, praying relief. This is not, I hope, the case of the petitioners. The Legislature if it take anything from them, it is proposed shall only take their extra profits? They therefore speak less under the influence of interest than persons interested generally do. No Legislative examination has heretofore presented itself to you so fully entitled to belief. You have not merely the declarations of the petitioners, but also the testimony of persons not interested, on oath and not on oath. Every material fact is confirmed by the testimony on oath of disinterested persons. You have seen on your tables statements on oath of disinterested persons, confirming in every particular the statement of the committee from New York; others have been read to you by your Clerk. You have seen from Baltimore and from Boston statements of disinterested persons, affidavits and letters which carry on their face the evidence of indubitable truth, all confirming the statements of the committees. I ask you, sir, what legislative testimony can be stronger than this? I ask, if the mere absence of the form of cross-examination is a sufficient ground for rejecting this testimony? I ask you, whether that testimony which would consign a man to the gallows, deprive him of life, liberty, property, and character, in a judicial decision, shall not here be received in evidence? No member of the committee, who looked at the gentlemen when they were testifying, could have doubted the general correctness of the testimony. The persevering and ingenious examination of a member of that committee put them to the test. If they had been incorrect in their statements, the incorrectness must have been detected. But, gentlemen say, there is some inconsistency in their statements. Sir, no instance has ever come within my observation, where a number of persons were examined, but some diversity appeared in their statements. It is not given to human nature to be perfect. Let gentlemen examine the testimony and they will find no material variance. They may find, or suppose they find, in some unimportant particular, a difference in the statements of one and a half per cent.; they may find some enumeration of particulars which are not properly applicable to the cases before us, which is erroneous. But take the whole mass of testimony together, and I pledge myself it is substantially without contradiction. Let those who doubt on this subject examine for themselves, and I have no doubt of their entire satisfaction at the result.

I say then, sir, that the mass of the testimony proves that the great bulk of these goods belonged to bona fide American citizens, and were ordered or purchased long before the revocation of the Orders in Council; that they were also either paid for before that time, or with money deposited in England before the revocation, and were shipped in pursuance of orders to ship when it should be legal to do so, or were shipped by persons on the spot, who had no reason to doubt the legality of such shipments. It has been proved, also, that the average sales were not more than 75 per cent. in advance of the prime cost. Let the members of this House examine the facts. I pledge myself for the substantial accuracy of that statement, that the average advance on these importations has not exceeded 75 per cent. It will be found that the charges and duty frequently amount to from 60 to 65 per cent.; and, excluding some charges which are not invariably incurred, are from 50 to 55 per cent. giving a profit, excluding charges not invariably incurred, of from 20 to 25 per cent.; and leaving a profit, over peace times, of from 5 to 10 per cent. Gentlemen may find particular instances of greater profit, but they are counterpoised by sales at cost charges, and the result I do aver to be as I have stated. And if this be the case, I contend that so many of the petitioners as are American citizens and bona fide proprietors of the goods are men entitled to the humane interposition of the Legislature, and that it will be worthy of this House to interpose in their behalf.

I will not further discuss the question of proof, except merely to advert to one or two particulars respecting which some observations fell from the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday. He said it was impossible for gentlemen unacquainted with mercantile concerns to detect the errors or casuistry of gentlemen who were; but, that if he could discover one error, it was fair to infer there were others. If, sir, one material error in these statements could be discovered, it would be sufficient indeed to excite the suspicions of the House, but not to condemn the statements which have been made, because all general statements must contain some inaccuracies. The gentleman's rule therefore will not hold. But if on the face of the testimony, in which the gentleman thinks he discovers errors, there is a refutation of his supposed discoveries; what shall we say? or if it will be found that the gentleman is as much wrong in one statement as he supposes they are in another, will not the one error counterpoise the other, and cancel the objection derived from it, even if proved? I think it will.

The committee state the average of the lowest duties at 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ , the highest duties at 50 per cent. Now, sir, I state that the several classes of permanent peace duties ad valorem, are 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 15, and 20 per cent. A duty imposed as a war duty, by an act of last session, doubles these, and makes them therefore 25, 30, and 40 per cent. Add to these the Mediterranean duty of 2 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and they stand at 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 32 $\frac{1}{2}$ , and 42 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

In calculating these duties, according to the usage of the custom-house, the gentleman says, those at twelve-and-a-half give a result of thirty-two, those of fifteen give a result of thirty-eight, and those of twenty give a result of forty-nine and-a-half on the prime cost of the goods imported. I acknowledge that the gentleman is correct in all these statements. He says the statements of the merchants are inaccurate, inasmuch as they say that the lowest duty is thirty-three and a third per cent. What difference, then, does he think it proves? A difference of one and one-third per cent. If there be an error of this small amount, can it be so material as to discredit the whole mass of testimony received? Admit that all the testimony discovers no greater inaccuracy, would not the mind of every man in the House be satisfied of the justice of the relief they claim? If there be no greater difference in the testimony from the fact than that supposed by the gentleman between thirty-three and one-third and thirty-two, then is the testimony substantially accurate. But the gentleman is mistaken. If he will look at the report again, he will find it stated that the average of the lowest duties, as calculated by the custom-house, is thirty-three and one-third per cent. What, sir, is meant by the average of the lowest duties? It is not an average of one, but the average of the low duties, as distinguished from the highest duty. It is not, therefore, the lowest duty that is spoken of, but the average of twelve-and-a-half and fifteen per cent. duties. The average is therefore higher than the lowest duty. And my honorable friend, with his excellent understanding, the acuteness he has acquired at the bar, and the wisdom with which his experience in the Senate has graced the whole, is entirely mistaken. My honorable friend is wrong in his first proposition. Is it not, then, fair to presume he is in others; and to excuse the petitioners for slight variations, when even he has fallen into error? The object of the committee of merchants was to state, that there were two great classes of duties; that the highest duty was fifty, and the average of the lowest duties thirty-three and one-third per cent. It is admitted that they have erred in an unimportant specification of articles. It is not true, for instance, that iron-mongery pays a duty of fifty per cent. It is true, as the gentleman has stated, that it pays thirty-seven or thirty-eight. But it is true that there is a class of duties at fifty per cent., and that the lowest duties do average thirty-three and one-third. The result of the average of equal quantities is greater, but the result of the average of actual importations will place it precisely on the footing which the committee have stated. Take, for instance, a particular year. I speak, like my honorable friend, from the documents of the Treasury. In the year 1807, there were imported goods to the amount of $36,260,000, liable to a duty of twelve-and-a-half per cent.; in the same year, $9,480,000, paying a duty of fifteen per cent. The average of equal quantities at these duties, as now increased, is thirty-five; but, in the year stated, about four-fifths were imported, paying a peace duty of twelve-and-a-half, and one-fifth paying a like duty of fifteen per cent., which gives an average result, as the duties now stand, of thirty-three and one-third per cent., as stated by the committee. If gentlemen will minutely examine the facts, they must be satisfied, as I am, that every material part of the statement of the merchants is practically correct. The only error which the gentleman from Kentucky has proved, namely, that certain articles, enumerated by the committee from New York, do not bear a duty, as calculated at the custom-house, of fifty per cent. on the prime cost, has no real or practical effect on the question before you, to a material extent, because the goods imported consist almost altogether of different articles. There was no interest, and therefore could have been no intention to deceive; there was practically no deception, because the erroneous statement did not affect the question.

H. OF R.

Merchants' Bonds.

In relation to the extra profits, which are made to form so important a part of this discussion, the gentleman says that, according to a rule of law, the largest sum should be taken in exclusion of the average of the sums given; that the extraordinary profits are admitted to be from five to ten per cent.; and that, according to the rule alluded to, ten per cent. is to be assumed as the extra profit. Now, sir, I cannot recollect any rule of law by which the gentleman is authorized to assume the largest sum instead of the average result; the last I take to be the rule of law and the rule of reason, likewise applicable to the question; the extra profit would then be seven and a half per cent.; this will be the extent of the claim of the Government, if it insist on this partnership in the profits. But, while the highest sum stated by the merchants is assumed instead of the average result, it is denied that even this reaches the truth; and it is alleged that these extra profits are much greater. But is this anything but vague suggestion? If I were to enter into a minute examination of the evidence on which we are acting, I could prove that all the statements of the merchants give this result, and confirm each other. For example, they have stated their profits to have been from ten to fifteen per cent., and their profits on the late importations to be from fifteen to twenty per cent., giving a result of from five to ten per cent. as their extra profit. But you are told that the merchants have derived an extraordinary profit from the depression of bills of exchange on England. They tell you that this is never brought into a calculation of profits on importation, and that, in a given number of years, it really yields no profit; that there are instances of exchange being as high as ten per cent., above par, and that then no additions were made to the usual advance. But, sir, the profit on exchange, if a profit has been enjoyed, has resulted from a distinct operation, and ought not to be amalgamated with the profits of importations, no otherwise than accidentally connected with the act of depositing money in England through the means of a profitable process of exchange. But the gentleman says, they get this profit, in fact, and could not have realized it but through these importations, and therefore it must be brought into calculation. Without admitting the correctness of this conclusion, let us see what this advantage amounts to. Now the proposition is, that we should take the extra profits. But, it appears that exchange had been as low, under ordinary circumstances, as ten per cent., and as the claim is only to the extra profits, in other words the profits not enjoyed in common times, our inquiry must be, how much do the late profits of exchange exceed ten per cent.? The evidence before the House shows that exchange has varied during the period of restriction from five to twenty-two and a half per cent. discount, and gives an average of thirteen and three-fourths; and, in corroboration of this result, a very sensible and candid letter, among the printed documents, states this advantage to be about fourteen per cent. The advantage, then, beyond that of ordinary times, is but three and three-fourths or four per cent.; and combine this with the extraordinary advance obtained upon the sales of the goods imported, and, together, they make but eleven per cent. And is it this for which the Government is contending?

I am now enabled to quit this fatiguing detail, and come to examine the subject in a general point of view.

It is said to be a violation of the restrictive system. My honorable friend from Kentucky says, this is one of the strongest arms this country has; that this assertion is proved by the examinations had before the House of Commons; and that this measure ought not to be relaxed or abandoned, which would be done, he says, by a remission. How is the value of this system proved? By distress said to have been, and which no doubt was, experienced by the manufacturers in England. But, although particular manufacturers ascribe their sufferings to our measures, yet it ought not to be concluded that the general distress results from this cause. It is disproved by circumstances. Some years ago, when we imported more largely than we would do now, if no restriction existed, we took one-fourth of the gross exports of British manufactures, and we exported again, to markets supplied by themselves, one-third of that fourth, leaving but one-sixth for our own consumption. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not deny that we are immensely valuable customers, and that our restrictive system has caused her considerable distress, but I deny that it has caused that overwhelming distress, if such distress exists, which the gentleman has intimated. If it does exist, it proceeds from other causes. I contend that we suffer from this measure a greater degree of distress than they do. Our suffering is greater, and more sensibly felt in the loss of revenue and in the loss of the affections of our people; a loss infinitely more to be deprecated than the loss of trade or money. Who, sir, are the distressed in England, who are said to have become such from this measure? Some manufacturers, an inconsiderable portion of the people. Who in this country? All persons engaged in or connected with commerce, a portion comparatively infinitely more numerous. It has broken the spirit of the country—it has rendered those most warmly attached to the Government almost disaffected. There is one-third of the people of this country interested in commerce, or closely and intimately connected with it, who are totally opposed to this policy. If we alienate from the Government of England, in her manufacturers, one-twentieth of the people of that country, we, at the same time, alienate from our own Government one-third of our own people. It is a policy, if it were generally correct, peculiarly inapplicable to our people and Government. The question under it is, who can suffer most? and here, thank God, they have the advantage of us. They are accustomed to suffering, we are not; that Government has the power to inflict more from its natural vigor; we have neither the power nor the disposition, I hope, to try our strength in this way. There is no doubt, if we confine our views to the effects of this measure on England alone, that we will be convinced of its power and efficacy; there is nothing of which so partial a view would not give a favorable impression. But if there are advantages in the non-importation system, on the one hand, there are on the other greater disadvantages. It puts out one eye of your enemy, it is true, but it puts out both your own. It exhausts the purse, it exhausts the spirit, and paralyzes the sword of the nation. But how did my honorable friends treat this system at the last session of Congress? Did they not themselves agree to let in fifteen millions of value of British manufactures, to obtain five millions of revenue? Where, then, sir, was the policy of your restrictive system, when these same gentlemen would have suspended it to gain so much revenue? Gentlemen, then, themselves gave up the system, and yet they now talk of the sacred character of this policy. It was given up on the first day of the session. It was given up yesterday. It is given up whenever you refuse to prohibit exportations. It is idle to talk of free exportation and a prohibition of importation. How else are your returns to be effected? The whole annual produce of the mines of Mexico and Peru, the whole specie circulation of Great Britain, would not furnish returns for the export-ations of this country for a single year of prosperity; and yet you talk of unrestricted exportations and a prohibition of importations. Yes, sir, adhering to the latter policy, you have already twice or thrice, in this session, said there shall be no more exportation law; and you were right, because it was a system of self-torture; it produces, indeed, an infliction of pain upon your enemy, which, comparatively, can scarcely be called considerable, while it throws yourselves upon the rack of excruciating torment. But, I ask again, how can the policy of the restrictive system be spoken of in such terms of approbation and admiration, when gentlemen were not only willing to give it up, but have actually given it up more than once? I am astonished at this incessant cry of the policy of the restrictive system, and an inviolate adherence to it when it has been relaxed every year since its institution. It must be a most extraordinary system. Gentlemen treat it as some nations do their idols. Sometimes they worship, and sometimes they flog them: So it is with my honorable friends, who alternately venerate and despoil this great system of policy. They were willing to abandon it to raise a given revenue, and now that the revenue has been obtained by an unintentional infraction of it, they say it is too sacred to be touched with impunity. I never hear the word "restriction" named in the Hall of Congress without being alarmed. It is greatly to be lamented, for the sake of the country, that this subject is so frequently agitated. Now the farmer is threatened, then the merchant. The country had not yet recovered from the alarm which was caused by the resolution of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. HARPER,) to prohibit the exportation of the great productions of the soil—a resolution which, like the comet that lately visited our region, affrighted and dismayed the wondering people, but which, like it, had passed away, we hoped, not again to appear in our time—when the resolutions of my honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. NEWTON,) numbers one, two, three—I forget how many—followed in rapid succession, and, like the tail of that great meteor, hung over us, giving signs of dire and ominous portent. These, to your farmers, are as pernicious as the plagues of Egypt. To your cities, the proposition on your table is more terrible than the pestilence with which they were, not long since, smitten by the judgment of God, inflicted in his wrath, but by his justice; which made the dwelling where health, and joy, and gladness, and general prosperity, had blessed the inhabitants, a charnel-house, and sent forth "the frequent corpse" through the deserted streets, accompanied by no living creature, save the patient drudging animal which bore it, and the lone sexton, who committed the dust of the body to the repose of the tomb. Yes, sir, even this was a more tolerable calamity to your cities than would be that plague upon your table.

DECEMBER, 1812.

What ought to be the policy of a Government like ours, at a crisis like the present, when we should have but one heart and one hand? Surely this is not the way to unite us. When, sir, you wish me, coming from the seacoast, to salute my fellow-citizen from the West as a brother, do not present him to me in the character of one exacting from me harsh and unmerited penalties. In spite of my perfect conviction of the benevolence and justice of my honorable friend from Kentucky, I must consider them as harsh and unmerited penalties, though even by him inflicted.

H. OF R.

Merchants' Bonds.

It is said, however, in support of the proposition on your table, that it is not unjust that the merchants, having gained this extraordinary profit, without the sanction of law, should be compelled to refund it. I have shown you, sir, in the course of this examination, what that profit was; that, from a fair and liberal construction of the testimony, it was but seven and a half per cent., and that to this might be added three and three-quarters per cent. for the extraordinary gain upon bills of exchange. Now, sir, the policy which this Government has pursued has been so variable, and, at the same time, so destructive of the present operations of commerce, as doubly to distress the mercantile part of the community—it has of course distressed these petitioners; it has tied up their hands for three years past, while they have been obliged to keep up expensive establishments, not yet quite deserted by the hope of better times, in expectation of some change; and this profit of eleven per cent., which fortune, and not your wisdom or kindness, has thrown into their hands, you are called upon to take from them. But have they really profited? Will they be gainers or losers, in the course of their trade, in the event of your permitting them to retain it? They will be losers greatly if you relinquish the whole. And, sir, shall we take from them that pittance which not your good will but fortune has given them; that which their spirit of adventure has given them, and in obtaining which they were not cherished or supported by you?

But, it is said, that though Government should take this, the consumer pays it, and it will come from the pockets of the country. My honorable friend from Kentucky stated a fact, I believe from a document of the Treasury, of which I have no doubt, that two-thirds of the people of this country are clothed in homespun. And where are those two-thirds to be found? On the margin of the seashore or in the cities? No, sir, the other third, who consume foreign manufactures, live in cities, on the margin of the seashore, and pay the whole. They pay the double duties and the extra profit, and not those out of whose pocket the gentleman would have you believe it comes. The consumer prays you not to inflict these penalties. Those who have paid it entreat you not to take this profit from the merchants; they say, let them keep it; they deserve it. And will the Government under such circumstances object?

But, sir, does not justice require the remission of these bonds? These merchants have done what your policy failed to do. They have given you three great advantages; they have given you twenty millions of capital, which will probably be loaned to the Government, if applied for in a proper way; they have given you five millions of revenue, which is already secured to the Government; and they have given you clothing for your army in spite of yourselves. Shall they then, after having incurred great risks in doing all these things which are so advantageous to the country, have fines inflicted on them for the good they have done? The proposition is unreasonable. Would gentlemen wish that the Treasury should not have been filled; that the capital of the country should not have been brought home? That the Army should not have been clothed? Surely not. And under what circumstances were these importations made? Under the sanction of Government; under its advice, as far as it was possible to obtain it. You are told by the Minister of your country, our resident in England, that he did advise the merchants to make these shipments. Now, I beseech you, sir, put yourself in the situation in which these persons were placed. Residing in a strange land, who would you ask to construe the laws of your country? The confidential agent, the worthy representative of that country, the man who has done honor to himself and to it by his conduct—he advised them to import—and why? Because he believed that in so doing he was co-operating with the great policy of the country. He advised the shipment. What is requisite to be known to establish the innocence of this transaction? That the merchants shipped under the impression that the law of non-importation would be repealed. Such was the impression of the agent of the Government. Was the merchant, whose information is necessarily circumscribed, and whose daily drudging fills up the measure of his time, to set himself up in opposition to the confidential and well informed Minister of the Government? The important fact that the merchants shipped under the impression of the legality of such shipments is further proved to you. The language of the letter of Mr. Monroe to Mr. Russell made the continuance of the non-importation act entirely dependent on the duration of the Orders in Council, and states that it will be immediately suspended on the revocation or necessary modification of the Orders in Council. But that is not all, sir. Who are the memorialists? Persons who reside in this country, who gave orders not to have the goods shipped till it should be legal to do so. But their agents in England have been mistaken. Those who supplicate you for a remission of these forfeitures never contemplated a violation of law. They are entirely free from every kind of imputation of intention to violate either the letter or the spirit of the non-importation act. Those who are to suffer did not direct, and could not control, the act for which they are to suffer.

But it is said there are several classes of petitioners, and that, though some may be innocent, all are not equally free from imputation; that some of them shipped after the declaration of war was known. Well, sir, if we take the testimony of Mr. Russell, they are equally excusable with others. He did also advise shipments at that time.

It would have been ruinous to the proprietors to have retained them; it would have deprived the nation of twenty millions of capital; it would have deprived you of five millions of revenue; it would have deprived you of supplies of clothing for your army. Was not the advice of Mr. Russell correct? Would you not to-morrow grant permission to bring home so much property so situated, if it would yield equal advantages? You would indeed practise a most extraordinary policy if you did. You would to-morrow authorize the act; and yet you would inflict a penalty for an act which you could not refuse to sanction. What would have been the case with this property had it been suffered to remain in England till the termination of the war? Do gentlemen expect the war to terminate to-morrow? No, sir, it will continue for years, I fear, if it continue till the principles for which it was commenced be obtained. The most conciliatory propositions have been rejected; we have nothing to hope on the ground of a speedy peace. Then, sir, why will you make a distinction between the different classes of shippers? The one shipped believing the act not forbidden by the laws or policy of the Government in a fair and honorable pursuit of gain; the other, under the belief that it was the duty and the disposition of the Government not to inflict on them the penalties of a law which certainly in its origin did not contemplate such a case, with a view to save their property from inevitable destruction, and themselves from probable ruin. It is also attempted to discriminate by the periods of purchase between those purchases which were made before and those made after the revocation of the British orders, and the first are considered as the favored class; but why should they be so considered? The first, purchased at a time when the shipment was forbidden, and known to them to be forbidden, with the hope of a change—from change of policy or an accommodation of the differences between the nations; the last, under a belief that the laws of their country did not forbid them to ship them immediately. They have equally violated the letter of the law, and are equally innocent of an intentional violation of its spirit. But those who purchased after the revocation believed that in the purchase, as well as the shipment, there was no law of their country which denied them the full advantage of the speculation in which they were about to engage. If, then, you discriminate at all, it must be in favor of those whom gentlemen, from their arguments, seem least disposed to relieve. But they are all in effect on a footing; because all stand on a footing of perfect equity, and an attempt to discriminate would be repugnant to that equity.

But it is contended, that this is a case in which it is right to aid the revenue of the country by taking a portion of the profit of the merchants. I say, sir, if it were just, it would be impolitic, because you would not thereby in fact increase the financial means of the country. It is a dangerous experiment in finances, as well as in legislation: You open a source of revenue, indeed, but it is one which only drips, and is drained in a moment, and you close the great fountains of resource, and stop the free streams of perennial supply. Show to the commercial part of your people that they are not regarded in a less favorable view than the rest of the nation, and they will supply the revenues you want by lending you their wealth; but, if you exact from them their little gains, will they assist you? No, sir, they will not.

What is the real advantage we are to promise ourselves from this new operation of finance? The Government, it is proposed, should get, perhaps, eleven per cent. on the amount of bona fide American property imported—say that the whole amount of property of this character is eighteen millions, as some have supposed, and it will give you only two millions of dollars. Take the arguments of gentlemen who endeavor to prove that not the half of this amount is American property, and these are the arguments of those who propose this financial expedient, and it will put but one million into your Treasury, whilst it will withdraw from you the confidence of the only class of people to whom you can look for money to carry on the war. Can there be any equivalent in one or two millions of dollars to counterbalance this loss? And here let me say, while using this language of the Treasury, that, I trust in God, no man who may be thus consigned by this House to the Secretary of the Treasury, to await his decision and to supplicate his clemency, will so far forget what he owes to his own true interests, and to his character as a free citizen, as to give any equivalent for that sum of money which may be demanded as the Government's share of the profits! I would rather see the objects of the war fail; I would rather see the seamen of the country impressed on the ocean and our commerce swept from its bosom, than see the long arm of the Treasury indirectly thrust into the pocket of the citizen through the medium of a penal law. We might suffer all these disasters, and our civil liberties would yet be safe. That principle of our Government would still be preserved, which subjects the purse of the citizen to no authority but a law so plain that he who runs may read. How are the exigencies of the Government for the next year to be supplied? That portion of them which is provided is rather the result of accident than forecast. Is the deficiency to be derived from taxes? No. I will tell gentlemen who are opposed to them, for their comfort, that there will be no taxes imposed for the next year! It was said last session, that you would have time to lay them at this session, but I then said it was a mistake. You now find this to be the fact. By your indecision then, when the country was convinced they were necessary, you have set the minds of the people against taxes. But were it otherwise, you have not time now to lay them for the next year.

What ought to be our course under these circumstances? Accident having thrown five millions of dollars into the Treasury, has supplied the place, and precluded the necessity of taxes for the ensuing year. It has furnished a basis of credit, and the balance must be supplied by loans. We should now, by an act of grace, conciliate those who have money to lend. But it is said we cannot conciliate them. I do not mean by conciliation, an endeavor to induce those who are opposed to the party in power to abandon their political opposition. I mean only to conciliate them so far as to make them see and feel that the Government feels tenderly for their interests; that they are equally favored and protected. So much is recommended by our best policy, while it is the just claim of political opponents, as well as political friends, in a free Government. The Treasury may be supplied by acquiring their confidence, without their political support and co-operation. I only say that we must not disgust the moneyed interest of the country. No Government like ours can support a war by direct impositions, or any other revenue raised within the year. It must rely on its credit for a great portion of the ways and means of carrying on a war. This is the theory on which it was proposed to act the last year. This is the theory on which the war was commenced. The great source from which you must draw is the commercial wealth of the country. And yet you are called upon to shut up and choke the channels through which alone it can flow into your hands. This would be, as it were, to bank in the periodical floods of the Nile—and would to God it were as little practicable—and prevent them from spreading their fertilizing qualities, and making their precious deposits on the adjacent lands. Commerce and agriculture may be aptly compared, said Mr. C., to this noble river and its floods. The last, like commerce, would not indeed exist, without the mighty stream, the symbol of agriculture, which flows silently and majestically within its banks. But this great river, which, in song and story, has, in the nakedness of truth, exhibited more splendor than fable and fancy could have lent, without these attendants, would have descended to the ocean "unhonored and unsung." Memphis and Thebes would not have been, and even the starry heavens, beaming only on the corporeal, would long have given no light, and afforded no charm to the mental eye. So no cause has contributed so much to the civilization of man and the improvement of every art, and every science, as commerce. Without commerce we should be simple shepherds or barbarian hordes. I deny not, Mr. C. said, the virtues of the agriculturists; they are generally, perhaps, greater than those of any other class of society. But the mercantile people of this, our own country, are inferior to no set of people on earth; they carried into effect your embargo, notwithstanding its occasional violations by some unprincipled men, with more vigor and strictness than all the douaniers of France, or all the navy of Great Britain could have done in any other country. Such is the character of your merchants; but if you inflict penalties on these men, who have refused to violate your laws and become smugglers, you will put them out of the commerce of the country, and those profligate men who are ready to violate every law you may enact, and who disregard every obligation of morality or religion, will supersede them. The general policy of every free Government, as well as the particular policy and circumstances of our own, forbids the course proposed to be pursued. The general practice and experience of free Governments discountenance it. Can gentlemen point to anything like it in the history of free Governments? I know there are examples, but I find them in the history of tyrants and of arbitrary governments. I find them in the history of Henry VII, and in that of his celebrated agents, Empson and Dudley; yet, in an arbitrary government, they were given up to the indignation of an injured people, and history has execrated the acts as peculiarly abominable, even in the conduct of a tyrant. Let gentlemen discriminate between the cases if they can. In either case the law has an operation which the Legislature never intended; in either case, the Treasury is to be filled. But say, if you please, that this is a doubtful case; that it is not assuredly clear that these penalties ought to be inflicted; what ought to be our course? To demand or exact anything in a doubtful case? No, sir, because the Legislature of a free Government has no right to act on doubtful principles. Few men will have confidence enough to deny that this is, at least, a very doubtful question on the part of those who would inflict the penalties; it would be so from its novelty alone. Sound policy, then, would recommend an act of grace.

I will add one word more on the subject of commerce, rather out of place. One of the most distinguished Kings of England, whose reign exhibits the greatest exploits in the history of that nation, among which are numbered the achievements of Cressy and Poitiers, Edward III, was believed by the good people of his realms to have discovered the art of making gold: for it was to them otherwise inconceivable how he supplied his treasury. He raised armies, equipped fleets gained mighty victories, conquered kingdoms, and spent vast sums on internal improvements: such demands, it was thought, the art of making gold alone could supply. The historian says, no. He cherished commerce.

Mr. ROBERTS next took the floor. He observed that he might, with great truth, state that he felt equal embarrassment with the gentleman who had just sat down, (Mr. CHEVES,) in rising on this question. To the considerations occasioning that gentleman's embarrassment, he felt superadded the duty of touching points, and possibly feelings, that nothing but a sense of duty could induce him to attempt. This duty the gentleman (Mr. C.) had made, if possible, more imperative by applying observations to former Congresses, as well as to those who may incline to adopt the report, which, while he should repel with regret, he hoped to meet with firmness.

The argument, Mr. R. said, had already taken a wide range. The resolution, though simple in its principles, is shrouded and obscured by a train of documents couched in technical obscurity, and resting on very unsatisfactory foundations. The gentlemen, he observed, who had preceded him against the report, had not very successfully dissipated this perplexity. It has become especially necessary to sink down to first principles, to apply the pickaxe to clear away the rubbish, and to tear the veil of technical mystery from this, he readily admitted, important question. It is an inquiry which I freely confess but a few days ago I was little conversant with. Some members of this committee may very possibly have entered on the deliberation without an intimate acquaintance with it also. His object was to familiarize the Committee of the Whole with what the select committee had in a degree become familiar with, rather than to attempt to place the subject in any new or imposing attitude. My honorable friend from New York, (Mr. MITCHELL,) yesterday told you, Mr. Chairman, that this was an affair of bonds—mortgaged—and that he would not take the pound of flesh, Shylock-like. I must beg leave to differ with the gentleman. I do not consider it an affair of bonds, nor do I want the pound of flesh. The case is not one of contract; far different is its character; it is an infringement of penal law. The party for whom the gentleman (Mr. CHEVES) invokes your compassion and entreats your grace, as suffering citizens, stand before you confessed, the voluntary violators of your penal laws. They come not to ask cancellation of their obligations as legitimate bondsmen, pleading a set-off against their conditions. Their true character is that of confessed violators of the laws, praying a remission of penalties incurred by infracting them, wishing to offer extenuating evidence. This committee, Mr. R. said, are not sitting here as parties to a bond or a mortgage, but as a high tribunal; who, if they act at all, ought to act with special regard for the good of the great community, as well as individual right and interest. They ought to weigh with solemn deliberation the high and responsible nature of their duty. They ought to decide, unawed by fear, unbiassed by compassion, and uninfluenced by any considerations but those pertaining to immutable justice. Need I remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the statute broken was the deliberate, the legitimate act of the Representatives of a free and enlightened people. It was a law not hastily adopted; a law ratified and confirmed by the approving voice of a great majority of the citizens; a law persisted in by a subsequent Legislature; nay, almost re-enacted by them, designed to effect a great national benefit; to give us what is so much desired by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHEVES;) so much desired by us all—a free, unrestricted, and prosperous commerce; a thriving agriculture, and the unlimited exercise of our national rights. Is the execution of such a law to be held up to scorn and opprobrium by an invidious comparison with the capricious, the wicked, the arbitrary exactions of one of the meanest and most odious of the tyrants that have occupied the English throne? Is the Tenth Congress to be ranked with the covetous and rapacious Harry VII? Or, are there any within these walls meriting to be likened unto the Empsons and the Dudleys, the execrable panders of his avarice? The gentleman's zeal must have overcome his usual liberality. My esteem for him will not allow me to think but that, upon reflection, he will be disposed to retract this unwarrantable imputation. A Congress of the United States to be charged with compounding penalties to feed the public avarice, like the fell instruments Harry VII found within the purlieus of the bar? The idea is impossible.

The non-importation act and its supplements, (I repeat it, said Mr. R.,) were designed to effect a great public good. The penalties were provided to prevent crime—not to raise revenue. The great end of all penal sanctions is to destroy the motive that would lead to the incurment of these penalties. Let us beware how we whet that motive by an indulgent interference, alike forbidden by the great principles of public policy, the settled principles of law, and even equity itself. If in a single case the law had been broken, no one would have invoked your grace for the delinquent. Can extent of infraction heighten the claim to your liberality? Too much importance has been given to the number, wealth, and usefulness of the importers. I am willing, said Mr. R., to allow them their full merit. I feel no hostility to them, more than I can fear their resentment if justice be done to the nation. Those who have appeared for the importers, admit that the export and import trade are not in the same hands—and, that the sale of imports is again divided between the jobbers and the retailers; so that really the importers form a much more inconsiderable portion of the people than the gentleman from South Carolina asserts they do. But, admitting they form one-third of our population, how does it alter the question? One-third of the people may have an interest in violating the laws; two-thirds may have an interest in their being regarded—whose interest in this case ought to yield? I hope, said Mr. R., the committee cannot be influenced by such argument, though imposed with all the graces of elocution. The committee stand charged with the conservation of the public rights and the public interests on the one hand, and with the dispensation of public mercy on the other. To do justice is a delicate task, but happily not a difficult one. All that is necessary for the present is, to let the law be administered according to its original intendment.

Mr. R. said he had endeavored to show, that if we act at all, we are not called upon to decide a question of bonds. The bonds are involved, and it may be well to inquire whence they originated. The importers have derived a benefit from them which they could not have done if the law had been duly executed. "All the prohibited merchandise" (says the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means,) "restored to claimants, has been so restored by order of court, without any other interference but a forced acquiescence on the part of the executive officers." Among the printed documents will be found a circular letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, addressed to the several district attorneys, dated the 15th of May last, instructing them "to oppose every motion for the restoration to the claimants of prohibited merchandise under seizure." Mr. R. said he recurred to this paper with much gratification, as the soundness of the argument and perspicuity of the style are as creditable evidence of the talents of a friend he very much respected and esteemed, as the promptitude with which this arduous duty was discharged is honorable to his official character. We may well stop to inquire if the judges have undertaken to legislate in this case. The powers they sometimes exercise in the administration of civil jurisprudence are equivalent to legislation, and no small portion of our municipal code is thence derived. All thoughtful and observant men must have looked on this stretch of judicial authority with serious concern, but we had yet to learn that any judge could be found bold enough to wrest penal legislation out of the hands of the Constitutional authority. But of this we can better judge when we shall have read the letter. I crave the special attention of the Committee to its contents:

Thus, then, (he continued) either by a maladministration of the law or by a mistake of its meaning, in the face of positive instructions from the law officer of the Treasury, not more worthy of respect from their emanating from such authority than for the conclusive reasoning accompanying them, some of the district judges went on to restore the seized merchandise, thereby destroying the penal operation of the law to a high degree, and benefiting the importers, by restoring to them not only their vested capital but even goods on British account to an immense amount. It put, beside this, into their hands, exorbitant profits in addition to all. Thus originated the bonds, and thus have they already benefited the importers; and yet this is not enough, the bonds, must too be cancelled and an act of indemnity passed, not more to glut the avarice of the importers than to cover the judges from censure and amenability. So far from the intervention of the bonds having made the matter less serious, as my friend from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) supposes, from the manner of their origination they present insuperable obstacles to a remission of the penalties. Gentlemen may say if the bonds are unlawfully taken they are not recoverable. With this, said Mr. R., I do not trouble myself; if it be so, we may hope there is too much integrity in this committee to indemnify such inequality. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) has dwelt with peculiar emphasis on the circumstance that some of the select committee who are disinclined to remission were at the last session for suspending this law. I, said Mr. R., was one of those who voted for its suspension; I have to plead error of judgment, for so doing, to the nation. I afterwards felt happy in having it in my power to vote against the reconsideration of the question to suspend. I was then led into error by listening to such arguments as are now offered in favor of a remission of the penalties since accrued under that law. Experience ought to learn us to estimate them better. We were then told, as we are still, our restrictive laws were inoperative on the enemy; that they were destroying our own prosperity uselessly; and that they were demoralizing our people by the temptations they held out to fraud, and that an immense amount of American capital could only thus return home. The pretended revocation of the Orders in Council and the subsequent shipments prove all these assertions to have been egregious errors. I am confident that a remission of the penalties incurred by the importers of British merchandise, as gentlemen wish, would be even a greater error than a repeal or suspension of the act at the last session. Under such a state of things, the country would have been in a better state than it will be if we now remit. There would have been a full importation; there had then been no monopoly, no extortion of millions from our consuming population. The gentleman from South Carolina has appealed more to the passions of this committee than to their sense of duty. He proclaims the report novel in legislation, but he has not attempted to prove it by fair deduction and reasonable argument. For the Legislature to step in and to wrest the administration of the laws out of the hands of the judicial tribunals would not be a novelty only, but it would be to sap all confidence in the stability and justice of the Government. All that is contemplated by the report is to secure the administration of the laws from interruption. If there be anything for Congress to do, it must be after the executive and judicial branches of the Government shall have executed the laws. The gentleman says, with great emotion, that he trembles for the consequences, if we do not, by an act of more than doubtful propriety as to principle, and most clearly unjust in its effects, indemnify the voluntary violators of the laws. The cause of his fears lies in the wealth, in the number, the weight, of the importers. If, sir, the mercantile class of our citizens, if an inconsiderable section of that class, can drive the supreme legislative authority with fear and trembling to suspend the laws and vote extorted millions into their pockets, then may we all, to use the gentleman's language, tremble for the fate of the nation. Happily, however, we cannot fear for this—our Government is representative. Its foundations are laid in the happiness and its superstructure is supported by the affections of the people. Every class and every interest of the citizens can have redress of grievances, but none will be allowed to tower above the law or to coerce the legislative authority by threats and mandates, while sacred justice and the settled principles of government lie prostrate. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) commenced his observations like a skillful orator, however he may have failed to sustain them as a sound logician. He came to the debate with his feelings warmed, he seized the point best calculated to secure attention. The novel, the immense, the dangerous powers the report would leave in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, has been spoken of with concern and alarm, if not with horror. A citizen has been painted suing and supplicating one of your officers in despite of his pride. The person of the officer is artfully made to put the majesty of the law out of sight, when in fact all the powers given by the law to the Secretary of the Treasury have the character of mercy. If used at all, they must be used to soften the judgment of the courts of law; and when used, the Legislature may, on all occasions, supervise and extend them if necessary.

Mr. R. said it was only left for him to glean this field, as his friend from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) had already reaped it with the hand of a master. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) has spoken of the amount of property involved in this question. He stated it correctly at near $40,000,000, including costs, charges, and profits. The Secretary of the Treasury gives the prime cost of the late importations as returned to his office, a part of which is on estimate, to be £4,000,000 sterling, which is, to say in round numbers, $18,000,000; the charges on which are fifty per cent, and the whole profits more. I mention this sum, said Mr. ROBERTS, to present a whole view of the subject. Amount cannot alter the principle before us; but the prime cost is not half the value of the goods which by law have been forfeited to the Government. Through the instrumentality of the courts, by means of the bonds, the forfeitures have been more than half given up; the only remedy for which, if it were proper not to mitigate, would be a recovery of the treble damages provided in the law. The cost and charges on the late importations will be found to raise the amount to $27,000,000; on which, if fifty per cent. extra profit be assessed and given up to the violators of the law, we may form some estimate of the benefits derived to the enemy, and those who have dealt with them. The importations are divided by the Secretary of the Treasury into five classes; the amount of each of which separately it is difficult to ascertain. It has been argued by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHEVES,) that the great mass are of the first and most innocent class. When I come to that part of the subject, I shall draw different conclusions. My convictions are that the three classes invested on American account, subsequently to the revocation of the Orders in Council, are much the most considerable, and indeed that a great amount, if not the greater, arrived in the United States really British property and on British risk. The profits of the importers or the coverers of this British property over importations in times of peace, cannot be less than $9,000,000. Taking the statements of average sales from interested sources, we get this result; and many reasons exist to show it is even more. Give the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) his statement, that the importers form one-third of the people, and why should Congress vote them a bonus of from nine to ten millions of dollars, extorted by monopoly from the consumer? Not surely because they have voluntarily broken the law and relieved the enemy.

It has been pretended by those who have preceded me, that agriculture and commerce are mutually dependent. Generally they are; but if, in a time of common privation, the bonus of an odious monopoly is about to be voted to a section of merchants, out of the pockets of the other classes of society, a conflict of interests arises. Such an one exists to an aggravated degree in this case. The relief given through these importations to the enemy, must prolong the war. Revenue is the sinew of war; and to force the consumer to pay first enormous profits to monopolists, and then to require him to pay his full proportion of war taxes, is too great a departure from justice to be tolerated for a moment. The interests of the many must ever be regarded in preference to those of the few. Here, then, we have many millions of forfeitures, that justice to the community will not allow to be wholly remitted, and in which even the gentleman from South Carolina admits that Congress cannot interfere except through the intervention of the Secretary of the Treasury. Yet an unwarrantable distrust produces in him a fearful anxiety. In his trepidation he would break in upon the settled administration of law—the stable principles of government. He would wrest suits out of the hands of the judicial tribunals, and give them, with the exercise of the prerogative of the Executive, to Congress. In the classes of importation there are circumstances attached that would justify mitigation in some cases more than others. The mitigating and remitting power, left where the law has placed it, can be equitably applied. The officer can call for and examine the best evidence; he can refer to original papers; compare dates, and defeat frauds. Gentlemen do not pretend Congress can do this. But they would remit all under the great head of American property; the rest, it is to be presumed, they would confiscate. They have, however, given pretty strong evidence that on their plan they would find little British property. The bonds have all been put into American hands, and from the confidence the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) has placed in the allegations of the importers, we may discover his impressions. I do not well comprehend how he is to arrange the detail of his law. Some tribunal must investigate the character of the merchandise, and would not the gentleman view with equal sensibility the same powers exercised somewhere that the law at present contemplates? At least there is little difference between us as to the principle and administration of the law. We are all for allowing a qualified remission—to obtain that the parties must be brought before some authority. The gentlemen from New York and South Carolina are ready to remit much further than we think justice to the community will allow. Extraordinary profits can be claimed on no colorable ground growing out of the infraction of a law calculated to redress the injuries of the nation, the policy of which has thereby been very much set aside. The law was produced by a system of spoliation and piracy on our lawful commerce, and violence done to our national rights, which had long been obstinately pursued by the British Government. Her power to wrong and annoy us grew out of a most prosperous commerce—that commerce was bottomed on a most extensive and successful system of manufactures. When she had turned a deaf ear to our diplomatic appeals to her justice, it became necessary for us to appeal to her interests. These last appeals have at length resulted in war. The efficacy of those first adopted, of a pacific character, are however no way diminished. It is well known that the sinews of our enemy's strength lie in her manufacturing ingenuity and industry, and that she can be made to feel the weight of our just vengeance only on her counters. The profits derived from a partial surrender of the non-importation policy cannot be justly given up to the violators of the laws; but they ought to be applied to strengthen the belligerent appeals of this nation to British interests to procure a speedy and honorable peace.

[It being late in the day, Mr. ROBERTS having acquiesced in the motion of Mr. SMILIE to that effect, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.]

SATURDAY, December 5.

Mr. McKIM presented a petition of Commodore Joshua Barney, on behalf of himself and the owners, officers, and crews, of sundry private armed vessels of war, "praying to be considered as claimants to all property proven to be enemy's property, found on board of vessels sailing under the American flag, having on board British manufactured goods, coming from Great Britain to the United States, and under the protection of British licenses, which have been captured by them, or that they may participate as 'informers' in the seizure and condemnation of the said property under the non-importation act."—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

State of the Finances.

H. of R.

For six per cent. stock, irredeemable until January 1, 1825, and afterwards redeemable at the pleasure of the United States. - $7,415,200

On temporary loans at the rate of six per cent. a year, and reimbursable as follows, viz:

1817	-	50,000
		2,150,000

For Treasury notes bearing an annual interest of five and two-fifths per cent, and reimbursable one year after date - 3,535,000

13,100,200

From the present demand, it appears probable that the residue of the Treasury notes, authorized by the act of 30th June last, and amounting to $1,465,000, will be disposed of prior to the 1st of March next.

It may be proper also to state that notwithstanding the addition thus made to the public debt, and although a considerable portion has been remitted from England, and brought to market in America, the public stocks, which had at first experienced a slight depression, have been for the last three months, and continue to be, at par.

Year 1813.

The net revenue arising from duties on merchandise and tonnage, which accrued during the year 1810, amounted to $12,513,490.

The net revenue arising from the same sources which accrued during the year 1811, amounted, as will appear by the statements, (A and B,) to $7,902,560.

The same revenue for the year 1812 is estimated at $12,500,000, of which sum about $5,500,000 arise from duties on the late importations from Great Britain.

The custom-house bonds outstanding on the first day of January, 1813, and falling due in that year, are estimated, after deducting bad debts, at $11,250,000; and it is believed that the probable amount of receipts from that source into the Treasury during the year 1813, may be safely estimated at $11,500,000.

The sale of public lands north of the river Ohio, during the year ending on the 30th September, 1811, and after deducting the lands which have reverted to the United States have amounted, as appears by the statement (C) to 390,000 acres; and the payments by the purchasers to $790,000. The Indian wars may affect the sales, and perhaps to a certain extent the amount of payments. It is, however, believed, that that branch of revenue may, together with some other small items, be estimated for the ensuing year at $500,000; making the whole amount of probable receipts into the Treasury for the year 1813, exclusively of loans—$12,000,000.

The expenditures of that year are estimated as follows, viz:

1. Expenses of a civil nature, both foreign and domestic - - -	$1,500,000
2. Public debt, viz: Interest, including that on new loans of the years 1812 and 1813 - - -	3,300,000
Reimbursement of six per cent, and deferred stocks, and of temporary loans and Treasury notes, falling due in 1813, and estimated amount of purchases of stock	5,200,000
	8,500,000

3. Military Establishment:

The estimates of the Secretary of War are, with respect to the Army, predicated on the employment of the whole force authorized by law, and amounting to thirty-six thousand seven hundred men of every description. Adding to this the expense incident to the service of volunteers and militia, and also the increase of pay of the Army, the appropriation for arming the militia, and $400,000 of the unexpended balance for fortifications, the whole contemplated expense may be estimated as follows:

Army—Pay, subsistence, bounties, clothing, and hospitals - - -	9,350,000
Ordnance and armories - - -	1,850,000
Quartermaster's Department and contingencies - - -	2,500,000
Fortifications - - -	900,000
Arming the militia - - -	200,000
Volunteers and militia in actual service - - -	2,000,000
Indian Department - - -	200,000
	17,000,000

4. Naval Establishment:

The estimates of the Secretary of the Navy are predicated on the employment of the following force, viz: Commissioned and warrant officers - 871

Petty officers, seamen and boys, viz: For 9 frigates and 9 smaller vessels - - - 3,620

For 200 gunboats and other vessels - - - 7,000

Marines, including officers - - - 1,869

And the expense is estimated as follows, viz:

Pay, provisions, and medicine - - -	3,290,000
Ordnance - - -	100,000
Repairs, contingencies, and navy yards, adding the annual appropriation of $200,000 for timber - - -	1,125,000
Marine corps - - -	410,000

Amounting altogether to - - - $31,925,000

The receipts on account of the revenue having been estimated at - - - 12,000,000

Leaves a balance to be provided for by loans - - - 19,925,000

Of this sum more than one million is already contracted for, and there remains on hand a balance of about a million and a half in the Treasury notes not yet disposed of. An authority to issue new notes for about two millions and a half more, being the amount reimbursable in 1813, will still keep the whole amount issued at five millions, and reduce the amount of the loan to about fifteen millions of dollars.

In order to facilitate the loan, and perhaps to improve its terms, it may however be eligible to leave some discretion in the Executive as to the respective amounts of stock and notes to be issued; which may be advantageously varied according to circumstances, without increasing the aggregate of both.

The preceding estimates do not embrace the expense incident to the proposed increase of the navy, nor any other expenditure not yet authorized by law. In order to meet any new expenses which may thus be authorized by Congress, it will therefore be necessary to increase the loan to a correspondent amount. The sums received, or to be received on loan during the calendar year 1812, have been stated at	$12,950,200

The payments on account of the principal of the debt during the same year, though not yet precisely ascertained, may be estimated (so far as ascertained on the 1st of December, at the Treasury) at	2,350,200

Making the actual increase of debt during that year	10,600,000

It appears, according to the preceding estimate, that the whole sum to be borrowed during the year 1813, will amount to about twenty millions of dollars; and that the payments on account of the principal of the public debt will exceed five millions; making the actual increase of debt during that year $15,000,000.

Of the revenue which will accrue during the year 1813, and on which the receipts of the year 1814 will principally depend, it is not practicable at this moment to form a correct estimate. So far as may be inferred from the experience of the short period which has elapsed since the declaration of war, it is not probable that the revenue derived from customs will exceed the amount of $5,500,000, at which it had been estimated in a former communication. The duties accrued, or which will accrue, during the last six months of this year, after deducting drawbacks and expenses of collection, are estimated at less than $9,000,000; which, deducting about $5,500,000 on account of duties on the late importations from Great Britain, and one million for the duties on importations from Calcutta and China, would not leave more than $2,500,000 for the ordinary revenue on those branches of commerce which are permitted by law, and from which the United States will not be nearly excluded by the law.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 1, 1812.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petitions of the merchants for a remission of their bonds,

Mr. ROBERTS said he rose to ask a further hearing from the indulgence of the Committee, under an undiminished embarrassment. Were he to allow his inclination to guide him, he should most certainly leave his argument unfinished. The asperity of controversy was at no time grateful to his feeling, and it is the more irksome, as it must be applied to antagonists to whom his respect would hardly allow him to use the full latitude of the freedom of reply. Considerations of indispensable duty only held him to his feet.

Among the papers, said Mr. R., accompanying the report, is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. This letter was received in consequence of a request of the committee through their chairman, that the Secretary would communicate the facts within his knowledge relative to the late importations of British goods. The committee confined their call on the Secretary to facts, by excluding a part of the original motion, requesting a disclosure of such other views as he might think proper to give. The worthy Chairman, said Mr. R., has been pleased to express great sensibility as to the question of suffering the Secretary to exercise his mitigating and remitting powers in this case. He has insinuated too, in reply to my friend from Kentucky, that the majority of the select committee, having discovered the sentiments of the Secretary, were disposed to obtain in the way the report might be made to operate what they would not as a Legislative body propose to do. For myself I can state, that I know nothing of the Secretary's opinions but what may be drawn from his correspondence. In the letter I am about to read, the Secretary was called upon for facts, and while he met their wishes in a disclosure of facts, it was not easy to avoid saying what in his mind merited strong belief. Facts are stubborn things, and will wear none other than their own features—but matters of belief may be made to submit to coloring. I call the attention of the Committee, said Mr. R., to those parts of the letter which show the Secretary's feelings towards the petitioners, in order that they may judge whether the repugnance of that importer to appear before him, which the worthy Chairman has so impressively noticed, can have any justification. The payment of my bond, said that gentleman, I care not for; but that I must submit to pray, to supplicate to any person—it is this which wounds my soul. One would suppose the laws had erected a dire tribunal, where the judge was not only inexorable, but that he was predetermined to discline to mercy, the fairest attribute of power. Let it be remembered, said Mr. R., the report goes not to change the course of the administration of the law, it goes not to lessen the mercy-dispensing power, it goes not blindly to reward guilt where the object ought to be the protection of innocence, it goes to support the stable operation of your "penal sanctions," to temper justice with mercy. [Here Mr. R. read a paragraph from the Secretary's first letter.] "It is believed that by far the greatest part of the shipments were made in conformity with previous orders from merchants in America to their correspondents in England, by which these had been instructed to make such shipments whenever a revocation of the former British Orders in Council should take place, it having been presumed by the American merchants that such a revocation would, by virtue of the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1811, produce a discontinuance of the prohibition to import British merchandise into the United States." Could, said Mr. R., a stronger evidence be given that if the mind of the Secretary has any bias it is entirely in favor of the importers? He believes that far the greater part of the importations have been made in conformity with previous orders. Unless strong facts should oppose themselves, he is bound, by this belief, to act—he stands officially committed. On this fact too, stands very much their claim to mitigation. Mr. R. then turned to the three last paragraphs of the letter. In the first of these it is said, that though in some cases sales may have been made not only to cover prime cost, but charges and duties, and even the whole amount of the bonds; yet the supposition that sales have been so made generally, is, he says, believed to be greatly exaggerated. Here then, is another instance where the mitigating power, as then advised, believes what the petitioners say is fact, and if it be fact, is greatly important to their wishes. The letter, said Mr. R., goes on to state it as an indisputable fact, that the importations are so far short of former annual importations and of the annual demand, and that in the sales more than usual profits have been realized. The difference is a tax levied on the community by those who have imported contrary to law, and is solely due to the operation of the non-importation act.

DECEMBER, 1812.

The Secretary states further, that of the forfeitures accrued, one-half is by law vested in the custom-house officers and informers, and the other half in the United States. The power to remit the share of the United States and of all other persons, in whole or in part, and on such terms as may be deemed reasonable and just, is by law vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. These sir, said Mr. R., are facts arising out of the operation of the law, which I had believed there could be no doubt of in the mind of any one. The worthy Chairman has suggested doubts of them, not as wholly applicable to himself, but as resting somewhere. He has not, however, given these doubts much weight by argument; he has rested them on little more than mere suggestion. The Secretary speaks without reservation as to his power over the case, on the broadest basis of equity. I do not claim a tame acquiescence in his opinion without further inquiry. But, said Mr. R., I call the attention of the Committee to this point, the more especially as my honored friend from New York has been pleased to say that he understood both the President and Secretary as doubting the powers of the latter. Considering the magnitude and unforeseen nature of the case, says the Secretary, it was thought proper not to exercise that authority until Congress had taken the subject into consideration, and prescribed, if they thought proper, the course to be pursued. This course then has not been adopted by the Executive from any doubt of authority, legitimate and ample, over the subject, nor from any fear in the head of the Treasury to incur the awful responsibility the duty would impose. Of my powers I have no doubt, says he, and that if Congress do not act I am ready for my duty, must be inevitably inferred. The subject, in my opinion, has been brought before us by the President from a respect for the high conservative character of the supreme legislative authority; from a respect for the opinions of the immediate Representatives of the people, for which, on all occasions, he has been distinguished as regardful; and let me add too, I believe, to a deference for public opinion, and a tenderness for the feelings of that class of citizens, whose private interests are immediately involved.

I touch not, said Mr. R., the point, whether Congress can interfere, except through the intervention of the Secretary's mitigating and remitting power, as to that half of the forfeitures which goes by law to officers and informers; my friend from Kentucky has touched that point, and it will be further elucidated by my friends who are to follow.

I am willing to admit, in argument, that our jurisdiction over the principle is absolute, and that the case in the hands of Congress is as clay in the hands of the potter; and yet, I contend, to remit that portion of the forfeitures which belongs to the United States, would not only be outraging what justice to the community at large requires, but, in my mind, the act would incur the guilt of deep iniquity. I will now, said Mr. R., call the attention of the Committee to another letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in answer to a request of the Committee, for such further and other views as he might think proper; but I beg you to mark, sir, with this condition annexed, at the suggestion of the worthy Chairman, whether, in his opinion, the importations had not been actually and materially advantageous to the Government. Thus requiring a judicial officer to disclose his impressions on a subject he might have to adjudicate, and one which I am sure he ought. In this truly delicate situation, how does the Secretary act? You have all the important facts, gentlemen. I cannot present the object in any new or other views. Here Mr. R. read the letter. We discover no disposition here, said Mr. R., to put the the advantages out of sight; they are admitted in their fullest extent. But, then, mark, after admitting the advantages, the Secretary stood as the administrator of the laws, he was not the advocate of the importers, but the servant of the people; his opinion being given as to advantages, to let them go before the world, without the other side of the picture exposed, might have served the importers at the expense of public justice, so far as public opinion might have been thereby affected. It was necessary to put in array the disadvantages. And what are they? These advantages have been forced upon you, contrary to the legislative will, as expressed at the last session. The policy of your laws has been set at naught. Your penal sanctions have been broken (as the gentleman from South Carolina would say) "in spite of you." If the gentleman has got anything by his interrogatory, let him take it. Let me, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. R., call your attention to the case of the Calcutta vessels, incidentally introduced by the Secretary, as illustrative of the condition of cargoes from the British Isles. In the act of the 5th of July, Congress gave a practical construction to what is called the non-importation act. The merchandise was admitted on condition of being warehoused, and remaining subject to the future disposition of the Government. In the face of positive instructions from the Comptroller to the District Attorneys, to resist a restoration of the seized merchandise on bond, accompanied with, I may say, without hyperbole, a most lucid and conclusive exposition of the law; in the face of the construction of that authority of which this committee form a respectable member, have some of your district judges departed, and that too under the occurrence of a case in which an appeal from the decision of an inferior court—nay, the most inferior, held by a single judge, was impracticable. Thus, have the violators of your penal laws, of peculiar sacredness, been more than half indemnified by the act of a few district judges—for, be it remembered, that a few only are concerned. If there were no other reason against a remission, it is sufficient to make it utterly inadvisable that that remission would go to set at naught, in some measure, the responsibility of the judges, who have so strangely, I will not say criminally, acted. They now stand liable to punishment. Now, sir, said Mr. R., to the last point in the Secretary's letter. "Upon the whole," says he, "I continue in the opinion submitted, with great deference to the committee, that the one half of the forfeiture which would otherwise fall to the share of the collectors, ought to be remitted, but that with respect to the one half belonging to the United States, justice to the community requires that, when remitted, at least an equivalent may be secured to the public for the extra profit beyond that on common importations which arises from the continuance of the non-importation act." And, so say I, said Mr. R. Here then we have the Secretary's opinion on the vital question within the purview of this authority under the law. One half, ought to be remitted—the decision is made. It is irrevocable. Were it on file in the Treasury Office—nay, were it executed—it could not be more binding, if the law be left to operate. One half, all you ask, gentlemen, is unconditionally granted. What of the rest? When remitted, that at least an equivalent may be secured for public use for the extra profits. Will the worthy Chairman tell my friend from Kentucky we have penetrated the views of the Secretary, and that we are seeking by covert means and a negative report to authorize him to agree to a humiliating compromise? No, sir, I am sure on better consideration his correctness would not admit it. The Secretary has given his opinion not to the majority of the committee in secret, but to the whole committee sitting in public; to this House in Committee of the Whole; to the nation, and to the world. In that opinion the extra profits are forfeited to public use, and that it would be injustice to the community to give them up. What these profits are, the Secretary could not know; and he has wisely forbore to estimate—that must be the result of laborious investigation and patient inquiry. As a judicial officer, the Secretary has forbore to estimate the amount till it shall become his duty. It has now, sir, become my duty, said Mr. R., and I fear not to perform it. I submit my estimate of the extra profits, under the fullest persuasion that it is below the real amount; but I am willing to take it, be it more or less. It is not, it is true, the result of calculation from indisputable data; but it is drawn from circumstantial evidence of the case, that produces in my mind undoubting belief. This evidence I am prepared, said Mr. R., to detail to the Committee. Before the United States' share of the forfeitures is remitted, I demand an equivalent to the extra profits for the public Treasury. This equivalent I estimate at half the bonds, or $9,000,000; and, this sum paid, I consider the importers as retaining a per centage above their highest profits in time of peace, and of full importations. You cannot but have observed, sir, said Mr. R., that I have already often trodden painful ground in the course of my observations; and that which, on rising, presented the most discouraging embarrassments, remains to be trodden, and we have come to the point of entrance. This subject came up in the Executive Message; it has since been brought before you by the parties implicated, in the character of petitioners—a sacred character—before the Representatives of a free and magnanimous people. The right of petition is an imprescriptible right in the citizen. The vestals at Rome, or the heralds who passed between contending nations, were less inviolate. Duty only could impel me onward—that duty has been made of superior obligation by the gentleman from South Carolina. He has told you the evidence on your table carries on its face the features of indubitable truth; that it proves that the bulk of the importations are American, and were bought early or before the British orders were revoked; and that the importers are perfectly innocent—as white as snow. I deny it: I have, sir, already laid myself under obligation to try this issue. My friend from Kentucky has once passed in review the evidence, but he has forbore to scrutinize it as closely as it has now become necessary to do; no doubt from feelings of that liberality to the petitioners he is ever regardful of, which I regret, it has become my duty not to imitate. The petitioners stand before you as confessed delinquents in the eyes of the law; ready, however, to plead their title to a remission of penalty. The law has been broken, all are agreed; and what is necessary to be proved to merit indemnity? The petitioners allege they shipped to get property home, which it had been their misfortune, without fault, to have had locked up by the operation of the non-importation act coming unexpectedly upon them; that they shipped, believing it would be lawful; and that their profit will not allow them to pay the bonds without severe distress or absolute ruin. I undertake to prove, said Mr. R., from the testimony before the committee, directly contrary facts. First, as to the time of investment. [Mr. R. here referred to the classification in the first letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.] The Secretary, said he, having reference to time and manner, had five classes, to wit: Goods bought on American account and at American risk, before the 2d of February, 1811, when the non-importation act took effect. 2d. Goods purchased and placed on American risk, between that time and the 23d of last June. 3d. Goods purchased thereafter and shipped at American risk. 4th. Goods consigned to American houses, or others as agents, under vague or obsolete orders, to be delivered over conditionally. 5th. Goods really British.

The petitioners ask generally for the remission of penalties on all. The worthy gentlemen from New York and South Carolina have given up the goods really British; the classes are thereby reduced to four. I shall divide them into two, to wit: Those bought and at American risk, before the 2d of February, 1811; and those placed so afterwards. I can see, said Mr. R., no just cause of discrimination between those bought before or after the 23d of last June. The depression in exchange and price puts them on a par, and I am sure the great bulk were obtained after the 23d of June, judging from the allegations of the petitioners themselves. [Mr. R. here referred to the printed report, pages 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, and 28, to show in what manner business has been transacted, and that it thence resulted that there could have been very few actual investments on the 2d of February.] We find, said Mr. R., that the execution of orders sent in the Fall of 1810, was countermanded on the appearance of the proclamation; that it has been usual under the late restrictions to give orders to be executed on the contingency of a revocation of the British edicts; that it is usual for importers to place funds in England in anticipation of their orders for the purchase of goods; that persons have gone to England with large funds and have speculated on the low prices of the last Spring; that orders are usually given by the 1st of January, but are subsequently revised. All then is admitted by those who have appeared for the importers, and it goes conclusively to prove that few goods remained in England on American risk on the 2d of February, 1811. But the committee of the Boston importers state, that large quantities of goods prepared for shipment before the 2d February, 1811, and which arrived at the shipping ports too late to be shipped before that day, were, in the ensuing Spring and Summer, shipped to the British ports in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Canada; and the greater part of these goods have been brought into the United States since the war. In confirmation of this, I learn that in Vermont alone duties have been bonded for to the amount of $100,000; and in Passamaquoddy goods to an immense amount have been entered since that time. The importers state that in consequence of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, giving them information that all goods arriving in the United States after the 21st February, 1811, would be liable to forfeiture, they countermanded their orders, and did not enjoy the advantages which were granted by the act of March, 1811. I have inquired at the Treasury for this letter, and find it was written on the 13th November, 1811, in answer to the inquiries of a single merchant, and contains only a reference to the terms of the 11th section of the act of March 1, 1809. From this letter nothing can be inferred in favor of the claim of the importers. The law was positive and plain, and he that ran might read; it was a mere private letter—an act of courtesy in the Secretary; it neither gave any construction of the law, or any opinion calculated to mislead the merchants. This letter was written on the 13th of November. The Secretary's annual report for that year was read and published on the 12th December following. In that report, which Mr. R. referred to, the case of vessels abroad is made a subject of particular notice. The merchants were then apprized as early as the middle of December, 1810, that a liberal extension of time for getting home their orders was a subject of deliberation before Congress as a part of the Treasury Report. The act of March 2d, 1811, went to admit the entry of all vessels which should have left England before February 2d, of that year; and, by a liberal construction of that law, unavoidable detentions after clearance, such as that which arose from the particular conformation of the harbor of Liverpool, where vessels are often detained many days, received further indulgence. A vessel was admitted to entry which had left England even as late as the 2d of March, the day on which the last supplementary act on the subject of non-importation passed. This, then, said Mr. R., I think another reason why we may safely conclude the portion of goods actually invested before the 2d February, 1811, and not brought away, were very small. My friend from Kentucky has told you he found on inquiry that from twelve to fifteen million dollars' worth of merchandise was imported in a short time before the non-importation act took effect. This could arise from nothing but the desire in the importers to get their orders all home. But there are other proofs that a very small amount of goods only could have remained in England at American risk on the 2d of February, 1812. Mr. Russell supposed they would form a very small portion of the importations; he believes the greatest portion was purchased after the revocation. There was then, he adds, great activity in investments. This testimony of Mr. Russell is itself almost conclusive, but there are still other proofs. Let me call your attention, said Mr. R., to the examination of the manufacturers from thirty manufacturing districts, already alluded to by my friend from Kentucky. Among the cloth and cotton manufacturers, the potteries, the hardware men, the complaint is universal that their stock of wares on hand had absorbed their capital, their hands were unemployed, and their conditional orders from America, if the Orders in Council were revoked, would relieve them instantly. Could this state of things have existed if the investments by our merchants had been made, or any considerable part of them, before the 2d February, 1812? Would the British Government have let five-eighths of the vessels depart after our declaration of war was known, and an embargo had been laid in consequence of it, to let home American capital, if she had not her equivalent benefit, and even more? No; it is impossible. I did not note down the evidence as it was received, said Mr. R., to any amount, not being qualified from habit to do it with facility, and it was the good fortune of the committee to have a chairman whose qualifications were superior. It was difficult, however, to catch everything. I find in the printed evidence from Baltimore, that the importations are stated not to have exceeded the orders, but to have been less. In my notes of this evidence it is stated, that many goods were paid for since their arrival. [Here Mr. R. referred to his notes.] The agents in England, encouraged by the prospects of a market, had shipped largely. This I am certain was said, though doubtless some of the gentlemen said what is in the printed evidence. That there were large shipments arising from the prospect of a market, and that there was a desire in England to find one, must have been natural.

Mr Russell expressly states the revocation of the Orders in Council, as it is called, was not due to a regard for justice in the British Council, or to an amicable temper towards America, but to obtain relief for their manufacturers. This fact, taken with that of five-eighths of the merchandise sailing after war was known to exist, with British licenses, as it is stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter, is positive proof that almost all the property shipped was either English or of American investment, after 23d of last June.

I think, sir, said Mr. R., that I have made out an evidence strong enough, that very little of the late importations were American on the 2d of February, 1811, and indeed not even of prior date to the 23d of last June, and much of them not till the arrival of the goods in America. The consequence is, the investments, lading, and shipping of the goods, were made at a time when the lading and shipments were unlawful, and the investments of more than doubtful propriety; and that the petitioners have utterly failed to make out their title to a remission of their bonds on this point. In calculating the charges it will be found, said Mr. R., that they have predicated them on a title to two years' interest, with extra storage, and other et ceteras. We will now examine the point of profits. In doing this, we are about to test the credibility of the testimony produced on the part of the importers. The examination of the committee of merchants, said Mr. R., is prefaced with the remark that "the statements made by them, being men of character and respectability, were delivered with so much apparent fairness and candor as induced the committee to give much credit to them." I do not consider myself as having agreed to these expressions. I believe I objected to them. I am sure I thought them too strong at the time they were submitted to the committee. Further inquiry and reflection have, if possible, diminished my faith in them. Mr. R. said he wished it to be recollected that the evidence under the different heads of the cities where the examinaunts resided was partly a voluntary communication, and partly answers to questions proposed for the purpose of uncovering the equity of the case. The worthy Chairman had observed that this evidence was the result of a cross examination, calculated to test its truth, and he was pleased to give it a character of strictness and ability above its merits. I did, said Mr. R., as one of the committee, put many questions to the gentlemen attending, but under the disadvantage at the commencement of a total unacquaintance with the subject, at all times under the restraint arising from interrogating gentlemen of high respectability on points in which their interests opposed a direct answer, and who appeared for others, the circumstances of whose case was more exceptionable. The Committee had no authority to examine them, and it pressed no question where any delicacy was felt to answer. The statements too are made by men who, out of their own warehouses, confessed themselves among the least informed on most subjects of trade of any persons in the cities where they resided. They are in many parts vague opinions, and given only as such—however, where accuracy was attainable, they will be found unfortunately erroneous. In this evidence, it should be remembered, the parties are interested, and while admitting the gentlemen are men of truth, what they have said in justification of themselves ought to be taken with allowance, while all that they shall have disclosed unfavorable to their interests must have the character of high credibility. The gentlemen from New York were heard by the Committee at their own request, and in the first section of their evidence were allowed to state all they wished, without interruption or interrogation—it is the fair side of the picture. They have there swelled up the charges to 60 per cent., they have even claimed more, and I will give them all; but it will be found, as might be expected, these calculations are made upon the assumption that the bulk of the goods were on American risk before the 2d of February, 1811, an assumption which I trust has been proved to be without reality. The gentlemen from New York have not said what the average sales have been, though they admit if the bonds be remitted they will have a handsome profit; they have made up a bill of costs, we must seek for the profit elsewhere. The hardware importers of New York have in their affidavit fixed the average sales at 90 per cent. on the invoice, and charged 65 as charges. From this strike out the extra charges, to wit: two years interest 14 per cent. and  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of extra storage, &c., neither which charges can apply to goods purchased, as really appears to have been generally the case, after the 23d of June last, and a clear profit of 50 per cent. on the invoice price, or on cost and charges of 32 per cent. after deducting the war duties, or 21 $\frac{1}{2}$  clear profit on the whole capital employed, without the advantage arising from exchange—which we will presently consider. We find the gentleman from Boston, on being asked for the amount of extra profits, in his printed evidence says, it has been from five to ten per cent. Subsequently he appeared before the Committee voluntarily, to communicate the merchants' affidavits on your table from Boston. These relate chiefly to piece good importations, and they make the advances from 90 to 110 per cent. That delicacy that had induced a forbearance to interrogate further on the first occasion, seemed now removed, and the question was submitted as to what the ordinary profits amounted to; his answer was, that the ordinary advance on piece goods was 50 per cent., from which take charges and peace duties, 30 per cent., and the profit on the invoice would be 20 ditto, or 15 per cent. clear profit on invoice and charges, including duties. This will be found the highest peace profits; ordinarily they are from five to ten per cent. But take this calculation, as that from New York has been, most favorably to the importers, the peace profits at 15, and the present advance at 90, which is low, and the profits on the present sales will be 40; from which take the average war duty, 17 per cent., and there remains 23 per cent. clear profits on the late importations, beside advantages in the rate of exchange.

While this calculation from the merchants' own admissions proves the profit on themselves, it proves most conclusively the testimony they have offered is of little value. My friend from Kentucky has stated to you that it was admitted by the gentleman from Baltimore, before the committee, that, in the technical language of trade in that city, goods sold at 250 to 300 for one hundred at the late sales. The average ordinary sales are about 134, which is something more than 40 per cent., out of which all charges have been paid and the importers had their profit—take the largest sum, to wit: two hundred and fifty as the average advance, which is 110 per cent. profit, so that the profits are 70 per cent. more than usual, from which take the war duty 17 per cent. and it leaves 53 per cent. clear profit; that is, 3 per cent. more than half the bonds, in addition to the usual price exclusive of exchange. Mr. R. read a letter from a respectable merchant of the District of Columbia, confirming this admission of the Baltimore committee. He held in his hand a letter from a merchant of Philadelphia, stating that he knew an instance of goods bonded at the invoice amount, $50,000, to be sold immediately for $170,000, or 340 per cent. profit on the invoice price; so that the importer could pay his whole bond and all charges and have $20,000 profit. I know, said Mr. R., however, the tales of the importers may have made it appear otherwise, I am stating sober facts. The merchant tells you he does not take into the calculation of his profits the rate of exchange, because if in a series of ten years it is equalized he is satisfied—in ordinary years this is no doubt a just and proper rule, but ordinary rules, said Mr. R., do not apply to extraordinary cases; such a case is the present. British goods being inhibited by law, the market had become exhausted and exchange depressed far below anything that could happen in the ordinary course of trade. My friend from Kentucky has shown you, from the reports of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, for a series of years, there is no material variation of the rate of exchange. As soon as the non-importation took effect, down it went to 23½, and the late importations, from the merchants' own statement, did not raise it to more than 14 below par, which make the average 18½ per cent. left. The importer tells you he does not consider this in his profit, truly, nor does he consider the seventy per cent. net profit on all costs and charges which I have just mentioned as anything but a proper gain—let him alone and you cannot cloy him with per centage. I think, sir, said Mr. R., I have said enough to show from the statements of the petitioners that they can pay half their bonds and retain more than usual profits.

Mr. R. then adverted to the testimony from New York given voluntarily, and remarked that the subsequent examinations were all made by the report to confirm that statement generally. I will, sir, said he, take it sentence by sentence and show you that the pretence set up for remission is neither true in fact or sustainable on principle; but, said he, there is one part which merits particular notice. My friend from Kentucky had stated clearly that there was a gross error or misrepresentation on the subject of duties. The merchants from New York say the average of the lowest duties as calculated at the custom house is 33½ per cent. on prime cost. The worthy Chairman has attempted to make this monstrous statement appear not materially erroneous in the face of demonstrative evidence adduced by my friend from Kentucky to the contrary. He showed you, sir, from authority not to be controverted, that the three rates of ad valorem duties, to wit, 12½, 15, and 20 per cent. were in time of peace the duties per cent. on the prime cost; add the war duties and we have 25, 30, and 40 per cent. for the duties on prime cost as calculated at the custom-house; add the Mediterranean fund, 2½ per cent., and we have 27½, 32½, 42½—take the importations for two, three, or a series of eight years, as my friend from Kentucky has done, and the average of the whole duties, not the lowest as the Chairman has urged, will not make 29 per cent. on prime cost, or more than 33½ on costs and charges, which last is duties as has been observed by laying a duty of 6 per cent. as charges before shipment and 10 on their arrival in the United States. Will the worthy Chairman tell us there is now no material error? Give the gentlemen from New York their assertion, and, instead of 33½ per cent. as the amount of the whole duties of every kind, they would have swelled them up to 37½ per cent. But this being a matter of calculation, liberality obliges us to suppose that though the worthy Chairman has failed to show there was no material error, for an error even he admitted to exist, that error might have arisen from mistake. My friend from Kentucky at least stands justified in his remark that the truth of the whole statement of the merchants from New York is thereby rendered justly suspicious. But they have committed errors still less to be apologized for. Crockery, glass ware, hardware, silks, millinery, &c.—mark the et ceteras, are dutied, say they, at 50 per cent. The highest ad valorem duties on prime cost and charges do not exceed 49½ per cent., and the articles paying this high duty are glass ware, black bottles and window glass excepted, and carriages and parts of carriages. This has been stated by my friend as only the 1-94th of the importations for three years past, or 3-264 part—taking a series of eight years, while in those periods the importations paying the lowest duties are for the first period 75 91 and for the second 213-264 parts. It is not true, as the evidence states, that glass were generally pays this high duty, as window glass and black bottles are excepted. Hardware, plated ware, millinery, and pottery wares, pay in peace but 15 per cent., and with the war duties and all other charges only 38 per cent. Silk pays the lowest duty, to wit, 32 per cent., while the merchants assert it pays 50 per cent. I beg you to observe, sir, said Mr. R. that this statement was repeatedly read to the New York committee at different times, and to each of the committees from the other cities, all of which are stated to acquiesce in their truth; among these, it is presumable, there were dealers in all these wares. Either they have been unacquainted with facts arising immediately out of their daily business, or they must have formed a curious opinion of the tribunal before whom they stood. The motive of the gentlemen I have nothing to do with, but if I have not awakened suspicions in this committee of the utter insufficiency of their testimony, I have failed lamentably in justifying my own impressions. One part of this committee, said Mr. R., I observe, feel irksome under my observations; to another I am thankful for their attention. I am not accustomed to keep the floor so long—I hope I shall claim such indulgence seldom—this duty has been forced upon me, and I ask the patience of the committee while I perform it. The worthy Chairman, said Mr. R., says the shipments were made, believing it lawful, and that the evidence proves it. In that part already reviewed, I trust nothing has appeared to justify this assertion. A printed paper handed to the committee by the New York gentlemen, which they said was handed about in England after the revocation of the Orders in Council, will be found in the printed evidence. I will, said Mr. R. turn to it. It consists of the 2d section of the act of March 2d, 1811, and an extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Foster, dated July 26, 1811. That in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, says the act, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President should declare the fact by proclamation, and that such proclamation should be evidence, and no other evidence should be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit or prosecution, &c. By an act of justice rendered (says Mr. Monroe) to the United States, Great Britain may set the non-importation act aside. Cease to violate our neutral rights, by revoking your orders, in which event alone the President has the power, and I am instructed to inform you, he will exercise it in terminating the operation of the law. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) says you put it in the power of Britain to repeal your law, and she did it, and added, it was conciliatory, and everybody thinks so—the President has said so. It must be a bad cause that could drive the acute gentleman from New York to take a single word in the Message used in mere common acceptation, without any technical meaning or a necessity for precision of language, as a proof of the President's opinion on the revocation. The President has said, it is true, that "the repeal of the British orders were susceptible of explanations meeting the views of this Government." But to make the act of shipment take the appearance of no intention to violate the law, not only the proclamation of the President must be dispensed with, but also those preliminary explanations spoken of in the Message. But Mr. Monroe tells Mr. Foster he acts under the President's instructions in his letter of the 26th July, 1811, in pursuance of the law of 2d March, 1811; the condition is, cease to violate our neutral rights by revoking your orders, &c. and my proclamation shall issue. The words of the law are "revoke" or "modify," "cease to violate our neutral commerce." But by the law the President was to be the judge of the sufficiency of the revocation or modification. In the letter of Mr. Monroe, he says to England, in language of great significance, what I expect from you is such a revocation of your orders as they shall no longer "violate our neutral rights." The shippers were then informed by the President on what condition the proclamation would appear, and without it the act of shipment must have been obviously to all unlawful. My worthy friend from Kentucky has told you the Order in Council of the 23d last June was not such a revocation. Will my friend from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) say that the reservation to lay them on at pleasure was not a violation of our "neutral rights" vital and flagrant? The condition annexed of admitting their vessels of war into our waters, while what had produced their interdiction remained unatoned for, was an aggravation of that violation. For the President to have issued his proclamation under the circumstances of the revocation of 23d of June, would not only have been an abandonment of his own interpretation of the law, but a palpable dereliction of his duty. Can Great Britain find an advocate here to justify her in demanding as an equivalent for a bare act of justice a surrender of our just claims of atonement for injuries and an acknowledgment of her right to legislate for us? The idea is too monstrous—too absurd. The revocation, if there had intervened no war, could on no principle have been met as the object of the non-importation act. This conclusion is inevitable, and the paper said to have been handed about in England, like the other testimony of the merchants, disapproves their innocence. Mr. Russell states that though he advised the merchants that they might make shipments with safety, he would not be understood to say, that he advised them that, if the law could not be repealed, that they would be permitted to enjoy the advantages of a monopoly and the consequent extraordinary profits. On no ground then can it be plead that the importers had any pretensions to a belief that the shipments would be deemed lawful. There, said

H. of R.

Mr. R., is another species of testimony before the committee, in print and MS., purporting to be affidavits and letters of merchants and dealers in British wares, which it may be well to advert to. First, there is that of the hardware importers of New York. They say the average advance on sales at wholesale is 90 per cent., that the charges are 65 per cent., which I have before proved is from 15 to 20 per cent. too high—their gain is, they state, 16 per cent. exclusive of exchange, which they fritter down as readily as they trump up charges. Following this affidavit is the certificate of David Dunham, not an importer but an auctioneer; wherein he states the sales have not been more than 70 to 80 per cent. advance, and sometimes they sold for less than costs and charges, and he is willing to add his corporeal oath if necessary to vouch the facts. Then come the retailers, and they vouch that they have bought the best and scarcest articles at 75 per cent. advance, this too after the importers had admitted their advances to be 90 per cent. I would just remark on the letter of Mr. Heard, that I know not whether he be interested in the importations to an amount above $3,000. In the close of his letter he states, however, that a privateer had captured a ship he was concerned in, and carried her into Rhode Island. The ship has been bonded, but the privateer would not give her up. The facts respecting this vessel are, that the appraisers did not value her to one-third her amount at invoice price. There was no way of preventing this fraud availing the importers, but by the privateer caveating against her release on bond. Let me ask, said Mr. R., with Mr. Heard, are not these hard cases? Truly they are; but the hardship is all on the side of the nation. Hillen's letter states an insulated case, and one of the few innocent ones that can occur. As to the MSS and documentary testimony, on examination it will be found, I think, neither more consistent nor more true than that we have already waded through. I think, said Mr. R., I may say with some confidence, the importers have utterly failed to make out a single point which they assumed for justification. So much for the rubbish, said Mr. R.; we have at last got a glimpse of what we are in pursuit of. Admitting in their fullest extent the advantages stated by the Secretary of the Treasury arising to the nation from these importations, and even that grace so eloquently invoked by the worthy Chairman, ought not to extend further than a remission of one half the bonds.

I will now, said Mr. R., reply to some of the arguments more particularly used by my friend from New York, (Mr. MITCHELL.) After a historical review of the causes that led to the non-importation act, he observes, "we come to this fact—that, while British produce was inhibited, we allowed ours to go where their proceeds were liable to centre in England. Those proceeds were invested in British merchandise, to avoid the loss of a rapid depreciation prevailing in the currency of that country, and to obtain the benefit of low prices which a suspension of trade to this country had caused." The fact that must establish or destroy this reasoning is, whether it was the case that American capital did centre in England, as is assumed. After patient inquiry, I must deny that it was the fact to any considerable extent. We have the strongest circumstantial evidence to prove that much of the late importations are British property, and that not more than five millions out of twenty were invested before the 23d of last June. The proceeds of our exports to countries in amity with England must, for the most part, have been gotten home through other channels, and that, as the gentleman has said, the comparatively small investments of American capital made, were induced by speculation on the low prices rather than due to the export trade.

The abundance of bills of exchange latterly in our market, is no proof that they were brought here by our exporting merchants. Their depressed price would have made it obviously unprofitable to take them with any view but investment in British goods; a fact which does not exist to much extent. I would remind the gentleman of the last winter's report, respecting £700,000 in bills of exchange, conveyed to Mr. Foster from the post office in this city, some untoward events having developed the contents of the envelopes. I do not give this as a fact, but such an expedient might justly be looked for, from the known turpitude of British morality, political and commercial. The gentleman admonishes us that we have afforded a "signal opportunity of showing our magnanimity." I do not know if we interpret the word alike. It will not apply, surely, to the encouragement of wrong. I cannot but hope that, if we were to use it on this occasion, the gentleman will, on better consideration, think with me, it would be the extreme abuse of a cardinal virtue. The gentleman warns us not to exasperate the importers. Heaven forbid, said Mr. R., that the remotest disposition to exasperate them should be felt in any bosom in this committee. I wish fervently to conciliate them. I advocate a course towards them of extreme liberality. There is no enmity in the agriculturists to merchants. I have been formed amongst the cultivators of the soil, I have participated in their pursuits, and believe I represent their feelings, when I say they sufficiently respect the fair and useful mercantile character. But no fears of the frowns or dislike of the mercantile interest shall induce me to offer the interests of the nation to propitiate their favor.

The worthy chairman has said the violation of the restrictive laws is one of the great heads of this argument. These laws, said he, have alienated the affections of one-third of our people from the Government. They have put out both your own eyes while they have injured but one of your enemy's. It is, said he, self-torture. The restrictive system has been resorted to, not out of choice, but of necessity. It is a choice of evils only. It is a pacific appeal to the interests of an aggressing nation, for redress of injuries she has inflicted on us. Open war is a forcible one, and their difference is only in degree, not in principle; the less is included in the greater; the former becomes merged in the latter. The declaration of war gave the non-importation principle greater efficacy. The gentleman has been, and still continues to be the avowed, the able, and influential advocate for war. War, being the greater principle, by parity of reasoning, must be a more severe principle of self-torture. It not only restricts trade and limits enterprise, but impoverishes, distresses, nay, it sacrifices the lives of our citizens. By the gentleman's rule, too, war may be truly said to have alienated the minds of one-third of our people; for those who clamor against restrictive appeals to our enemy's interests clamor against belligerent ones equally loud. But, sir, said Mr. R., how is the gentleman sustained in his assertion that by non-importation we hurt but one eye of our enemy, while we put out both of our own. Is the picture of the distress of our seaport towns which he has drawn justified? Enter them, and we find the mercantile class basking in a splendor and opulence that few can contemplate without sensations of pride and pleasure; we find plenty and comfort everywhere; no one is beheld retiring supperless to rest. This, sir, said Mr. R., I am sure you will admit not to be an overcharged picture. Well, sir, now let us look on the other side of the water. [Here Mr. R. turned to the examination of the manufacturers in England, before the committee of the House of Commons.] Have we, said he, thirty manufacturing districts, surcharged with a population famishing for want of oatmeal and potatoes, whose squalid habiliments and hunger-worn countenances must melt every beholder with compassion? There is not a family in our country, however indigent, thanks be to Heaven! but what has yet to learn to live on oatmeal and potatoes.

To reason in support of so obvious a principle as the effect of our non-importation act, would be waste of time. The gentleman says that, from an authentic document, read by my friend from Kentucky, it appears two-thirds of our population are clothed in domestic manufactures, and infers from thence the seaboard consumes the foreign merchandise and pays the impost. The gentleman talks of conciliating and identifying all our citizens in the same great community of interests; and, unfortunately, we find him the next moment drawing invidious distinctions of the merit and suffering of the seaboard over the interior, that have no foundation in fact, and exciting jealousies for which there is no cause. I live, said Mr. R., within twenty miles of the port of Philadelphia. In that place a great proportion of the articles entering into every kind of domestic convenience are really of American fabrication, while I assert, without fear of contradiction, that, in the country west of the mountains, generally, even in Kentucky, remote as she lies from maritime commerce, the use of foreign fabrics prevails so as to withdraw the circulating medium from that country, greatly to the prejudice of industry and internal improvement. The enterprise of the mercantile character pushes its correspondence over every obstacle; its object is to sell its wares for a good price; and it will not rest within the narrow limits on the seaboard, while the markets of the Ohio and its tributary waters invite that enterprise. We have been reminded that the non-importation act cannot be enforced while we admit of an export trade. The returns must be had, it is said, in some way. If the nation was at war with the whole circle of commercial States, this might be true. But while there remain relations of intercourse with all the world, Britain excepted, it would, indeed, be carrying the principle of self-torture very far, if we were to annihilate our export commerce and our agricultural industry, because imports from Britain and her dependencies are inhibited. Then might the gentleman say truly, that we were putting out one eye of our enemy and both our own. But it is waste of time to controvert such arguments; they carry on their face a sufficient refutation. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) says he hopes no importer will give the Treasury anything but money; in another place he has spoken of a humiliating compromise. The gentleman must have here meant more than he said. The inference is irresistible, that we are wishing covertly to get something for the Treasury besides money, and, to obtain that end, are willing to submit to a humiliating compromise. We have fairly argued for half the bonds; this is what we believe justice to the community requires should not be remitted. But, having due regard to the merciful operation of the law, for it never contemplated forfeitures without equitable relief, in its spirit and not in the letter, I declare, without hesitation, if there be within the exercise of the mitigating power any other way to fulfil what justice to the community requires, more lenient to the importers than a payment of the money, that course I wish to prevail, notwithstanding the gentleman may strive to stamp it with the opprobrium of a humiliating compromise.

The gentleman from South Carolina tells you the importers have obtained their profits in spite of you, and asks, Will you now take it from them? I cannot express the disapprobation I feel of this sentiment. In this House, are we not only to find apologists for, but eulogists of the violators of the supreme laws of the land? In spite of you, they have obtained their profits through the agency of British licenses, British Orders in Council, and British insurance against American captures; and your district courts, which, if they are not British, have, by an abuse of power, worse even than British prize court iniquity, sealed the wishes of the British Cabinet by a transmutation of British imported merchandise into American capital. This, sir, has been done, indeed, in spite of your laws—in spite of your revenue officers—ay, and the gentleman says, in spite of yourselves—and he rises to mock you with a panegyric on this brilliant achievement—even the Secretary of the Treasury, he says, admits it gives you great advantages in spite of your own policy; he pleads your grace inasmuch as they have despised you.

DECEMBER, 1812.

Merchants' Bonds.

H. OF R.

The gentleman says an agreement to the report will shake your party connexion. That he rises or falls with his party, and trembles for the consequences. For six years, said Mr. R., you have lain prostrate before your enemies from the fatal influence of faction; even now, when, through a series of long suffering, we have arrived at the point of resistance, a cry of peace within these walls has inspirited your enemy, and as if this was not enough, we are menaced with the rearing of a new standard. While I view these things with concern, I can never compromise my duty in hopes to do them away. In the same spirit the Secretary of the Treasury has been distorted to a monster. The high official character with which he has been clothed, the purity and fidelity with which he has discharged his duty, have availed him not; he is represented as holding in his hands the fate of individuals, if this resolution passes, on whom he is ready to fasten the talons of his power. The abominable metaphor of the long arm of the Treasury has even been resorted to, forgetful of all liberality, in favor of a misplaced compassion. It is not the payment of the bond that is dreaded, we are told, but to sue before your officer for "grace." Let this high-spirited importer pay his bond, and his feelings are spared. Let him abide by the judgment of the courts of law, and he need not seek relief in chancery. But why is such repugnance felt in appearing before an officer who has no powers, but to soften the rigor of the judgment of the courts of law, and who, if he is not merciful enough, may have his decrees further mitigated by Congress, who may act with propriety when redress can be had before no other tribunal, and while, too, if that officer be too lenient, his decrees are final, however the public interests may suffer. To conjure up such objections against the course we contend for, under the circumstances they are offered, argues an utter misconception of the case, or that most unwarrantable prejudices are indulged. The gentleman has aptly compared agriculture and commerce to that river that irrigates and fertilizes the plains of Egypt. The river, he tells us, represents the productive industry of the former, while the periodical floods are emblems of the fertilizing qualities of the latter. I take the gentleman's simile, but draw a very different conclusion. A too long continuance of the inundation must not only destroy vegetation, but generate pestilence, and poison the living fountains of the stream. To preserve the mutual interest between agriculture and commerce, the desire of profit to the merchant must sometimes be restrained, or it will overleap the bounds of a fair community of interest. At no time more than the present can there be a greater urgency for the application of the restraint. The gentleman says, without commerce we should be shepherds or Barbarian hordes; and let me ask him, what we are with it? Ruthless savages, contending often sanguinarily for its profits with a remorseless cruelty that barbarian hordes would shudder to behold. By arguing from extremes, we may prove too much. In this way, the palm of merit was given by an enlightened literary tribunal to him who defended a savage life. A free Government, says the gentleman, ought to be lenient. I admit it; but then, in its leniency it ought ever to avoid injustice. Here, said Mr. R., I am ready to close my arguments, and humbly hope that I may be allowed to adduce from thence that one-half the bonds ought to be paid into the Treasury, or an equivalent for their remission, and that it would be wrong to interfere legislatively, until the Executive and Judicial branches of Government shall have administered the law.

When Mr. R. had concluded, it being late in the day, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, December 7,

Another, member, to wit: from Virginia, EDWIN GRAY, appeared, and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement exhibiting the expenditure of the annual appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars, made by the law, entitled "An act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States," passed the 23d day of April, 1808, with information as to the number of "arms and military equipments" that have been purchased or made, and the manner and proportion in which they have been transmitted and distributed to the several States and Territories, in pursuance of the provisions and requisitions of the aforesaid act.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on this subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON said: Mr. Chairman, after I became acquainted with the facts, on which the question before us arises, I did entertain a hope that there would be no diversity of sentiment among us as to the propriety of granting the prayer of these petitioners in the fullest extent. Some difference of opinion as to the mode I indeed anticipated, but none as to the justice of doing it. I thought, sir, that the distresses which our merchants have suffered, under our restrictive experiments upon foreign nations, would entitle them to our particular consideration. The measures of the Government have fallen with peculiar severity upon this class of our citizens. The produce of agriculture has at times commanded a great, at all times a good price. The manufacturer has grown rich, and other classes of the community have enjoyed their usual prosperity. Upon the merchant almost exclusively has the pressure of the times borne. I thought, sir, this circumstance would induce gentlemen to lend a favorable ear to these petitions.

I also thought, sir, that this class of our citizens had claims from its respectability to our particular attention. I will venture to affirm, and I call upon all the honorable gentlemen who represent them in every part of this House, and from all parts of the Union, to bear witness to the truth of the remark, that in fair and unspotted character, that in honor and integrity, in activity and enterprise; that in all those qualities both of the head and the heart that can adorn and dignify the nature of our species, the merchants of our country are second to no class in the community. It is true, sir, they have not been silent under the pressure of our measures; they have sinned both in thought and in word against our restrictive system—a sin, which in this House I fear cannot easily be forgiven. But do gentlemen wonder that they have complained? I put it to every honorable gentleman, whether, if our measures had fallen upon the yeomanry of our country with one-tenth part of the severity with which they have fallen upon the merchants, it would not have raised a storm that neither this nor any other Administration could have rode out in safety? It is a singular fact, but it is not more singular than true, that for these five years last past, whenever you have planned any grand measures of coercion—whenever we have collected any vial of uncommon wrath against foreign nations, the contents of it have in every instance been poured directly upon the heads of our own luckless merchants! And is it to be thought strange that they should think our measures a little unluckily directed? Is it wonderful that they should doubt the policy of some of our measures? They have been stigmatized as a class of men incapable of restraint, as habitual violators of our laws. Sir, the charge is a gross slander upon their character. They have not violated our laws. Distressing as our measures have been to them, they have submitted with a patience truly astonishing. No, sir, the regular merchants have not been the violators of our laws. But our measures, while they have driven the fair and honorable merchant from his accustomed trade, and have dried up the fountains of his wealth, have raised up a set of men, the rank produce of troubled times, who were not regular merchants before, and who, against our laws and in spite of our laws, have carried on trade and have grown rich on the ruins of the honest merchant. These are the men who have violated your laws. The state of things which our measures have produced has been a school admirably adapted to teach the art of violating our laws. If there were no other evil resulting from the restrictive system than the tendency it has had to corrupt the public morals in this particular, and to invite men to become the pupils of smuggling, that alone ought to stamp its memory with execration. Trust me, sir, in the enforcement of your revenue laws hereafter you will be taught to feel the full force of this remark. Let me then implore gentlemen to lay aside their ill-founded prejudices against merchants, and not lay to their charge sins of which they have not been guilty. I implore you then to decide this new, this singular, this important question, without prejudice and without partiality.

I do not propose to examine minutely the testimony which has been laid before us. I do not, sir, propose to follow gentlemen through the long and labored course of reasoning by which this resolution is attempted to be supported. I only propose to consider some of the more prominent remarks which gentlemen have made in favor of it, and to state some of the reasons which induced me to oppose it.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) has remarked that this question derives all its importance from the amount of property involved in the decision. Sir, I am of a very different opinion. That it derives some importance from that consideration, I admit; but not all its importance. It is not unimportant that the decision of this House in every case, however small the amount of property involved, should be correct. It is important that justice should be done to every class of citizens, however few in number or humble in situation. But, sir, the merchants are a great and powerful class of our citizens; and if we should do what they may deem to be injustice, it may, in the present crisis of our affairs, draw after it consequences more serious than gentlemen may apprehend. The question derives much of its importance from the respectability of the petitioners.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) says, that those who agree with the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject wish to refer these petitions to the Secretary of the Treasury, because they agree with him in opinion. This, sir, is candid. I will endeavor to be equally candid; and declare freely that the very reason why I wish not to refer them to him is, because I do not agree with him in opinion. It is also asked, do we doubt the competency of the Secretary of the Treasury? Have we not confidence in that high and respectable officer? If I am asked the question, generally, whether I have confidence in the talents and integrity of that officer, I freely answer, yes; but if asked as to my confidence in his decision in this particular case, I as freely answer, no, I have not. I think his views, so far as I can understand them from his letters to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, are very incorrect.

It is said, there ought to be a distinction between property purchased in England before the 2d of February, 1811, and property purchased since that time, and shipped to this country; and that we cannot go into an inquiry that will enable us to make this distinction. Sir, I deny that any distinction ought to be made. The only distinction we ought to make, should be between bona fide American, and British property. Perhaps this distinction cannot be made. I wish it could; and trust it may be. But suppose it cannot; ought we, sir, to condemn American property, because a little English property happens to be mingled with it? It is said to be better that ten guilty persons should escape punishment, than that one innocent person should suffer. If we enforce the payment of these bonds, we shall punish and distress a hundred innocent American citizens, in order to reach one English subject.

Another reason urged why we should enforce the payment of a portion of these bonds is, that the merchants have made unusual profits in the late importations. If they have made large profits, sir, I rejoice at it. I rejoice that fortune should have broken through the clouds that have so long hung over their affairs, and in one solitary instance have shone pleasantly upon them. I trust that Providence will bless them in the enjoyment of their profits; and as it has enabled them to rescue their property from the hands of our enemies, that it will also enable them to preserve it from the hungry jaws of our Treasury. Forbid it; the dignity of this House forbid it; the respect which we owe to ourselves, that we should lay our hands upon it! I have no disposition to enter into this retrospective partnership with our merchants, in order to share the profits without the losses of trade. It would be to the Government, in my apprehension, a partnership equally disgraceful and ruinous.

It is said, if we relinquish these bonds, we must tax the yeomanry of our country. Sir, I had feared that this consideration might have an influence on this decision. But I did not expect to hear it openly avowed. I had supposed that if any honorable gentleman should be charged with being under the influence of this motive, he would repel the insinuation with indignation; but I was mistaken, it seems. Perhaps the motive is a legitimate one. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. The merchants have been accustomed to suffer. Adversity is said to be the tamer of the human breast. Perhaps they may now submit quietly to injury and injustice. But it is not quite clear that the yeomanry will submit quietly to taxation. The experiment is yet to be made, whether we can safely put our hands directly into the pockets of the people and take their money. It might conjure up a "spirit" among them that "would push us from our seats."

It is also said to be due to the non-importation act that we should enforce the payment of these bonds. Indeed, sir, and is the non-importation act to be made the object of religious homage? Are we to erect altars and offer sacrifices to it? Are those altars to be sprinkled with the blood of the merchants? Sir, gentlemen are mistaken. They may devote this House to the worship of the non-importation act, and they may here sing its high praises, but trust me, sir, those praises will not be re-echoed by the approving voices of the people. There is a deep and awful murmur running along your seaboard, from one extremity of the Continent to the other, constant as the dashing of the waves of the ocean upon your shores. If the people must sacrifice to this idol, it will be, sir, not as the guardian power of their national rights, but as to a dark, malignant demon, that mixes with our policy, to weaken and paralyze, and palsy and ruin, and destroy all our energies, to distract and divide the people, to weaken their confidence in their Government, and in fine, sir, to sink our nation from a height of prosperity and happiness that was the envy, to an abyss of misery and wretchedness, that will excite the compassion, of all other nations. I implore gentlemen no longer to look to this miserable policy, but to trust to the strong arm of our soldiery and the prowess of our Navy, for the defence of our rights. Unshackle commerce, and, by cherishing and protecting, enlist her under your banners. Unharness from your war car this wretched, worn out, limping pack-horse, the non-importation act. Do this, sir, and my life, upon it, you will no longer see your armies wandering, sad and disgusted, with the slow and solemn pace of a funeral procession, among the dismal wilds of your northern frontier, with defeat by their side, and the people following mournful and reluctantly in their rear. Do this, and the wings of your eagle will no longer flag, nor,

"The terrors of his beak, the lightnings of his eye."

The people will fight for their rights, but depend upon it, sir, they will not fight to enforce your restrictive system. But if gentlemen are still disposed to sing the praises of this system, for Heaven's sake let them adopt a new tune. We have lately been furnished with one finely adapted to the occasion—for the rest of this session at least let the tune be, "The last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury!" and the vaults of your Treasury will be found in admirable condition to re-echo the inspiring sounds to the ears of your enemy.

It is said these importations are injurious to the country, except so far as they bring duties into the Treasury. This position is founded on a train of reasoning that ought to be not a little alarming to the commercial sections of the Union. It is bottomed on the idea that commerce is an injury to the country; that we can do better without it, and live, as it is called, independently! I am not very well versed in the forms of the school in which these doctrines are taught, and shall not attempt to go through the detail of the system, but shall content myself with entering a strong and decided protest against such doctrines as hostile to the best interests of this country. But, sir, the people will be much puzzled, I fancy, to see how, if these importations have been in other respects injurious, any advantage has been derived from their being compelled to pay five millions of dollars in duties upon them. This is a political riddle, the meaning of which is "unseen, invisible, inscrutable," to everybody out of this House, but to all within it is plain as the nose on a man's face, or a weathercock on a steeple. It enables us to take from the pockets of the people and place in the Treasury at our disposal five millions of dollars, without composing a single feature in the countenance of that nice and delicate lady—our popularity with our constituents. But is it not astonishing, sir, that gentlemen should not see that commerce at all times possesses this magic? That it is at all times to the Government emphatically the philosopher's stone, converting everything into gold? Do not gentlemen remember that when commerce was permitted, unmolested, to cultivate the ocean, she returned to our Treasury an annual harvest, rich and abundant as the crop that was gathered from our hills and our valleys? and that plenty was in our dwellings, and gladness in our hearts? And do they not see, since our restrictive system, like a frost, a bitter, biting frost, passed over her dominions, chilling all her hopes and blasting all her prospects, that she no longer yields her accustomed tribute, and that our Treasury shares in all her distresses?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROBERTS) has remarked that these petitioners stand before us confessedly guilty; that they sue not for grace, but for pardon. And are we really sitting here, sir, clothed with one of the highest attributes of sovereignty, not to grant freely, but to sell, pardon to the humble, guilty supplicant? Is there a price in this House for the pardon of crimes? The merchants are guilty. Of what, sir? Of bringing into our country twenty millions of capital? Of rescuing twenty millions from the hand of our enemies? Of bringing five millions of dollars into our exhausted Treasury? If these things be crimes, let us forgive freely; in the name of Heaven, let us not disgrace ourselves and the nation by selling pardon for such offences. I was at first struck with the peculiar manner in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania expressed himself. They sue not for grace, but for pardon. I was at a loss to comprehend his precise meaning; for I had always thought pardon was an act of grace. But I find the honorable gentleman thinks differently, and understands pardon not to be a matter of grace, but an article of sale. He is willing to grant these merchants a pardon, provided they will give all their profits as the price of it.

It was with extreme regret, that I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania remark that this was a question between the merchants and the other classes of the community; because if the question is understood to be such by this House generally, I fear the case of these petitions is a desperate one. I begin to perceive that merchants are no favorites here. If the other classes of the community are understood to have an adverse interest, they must expect no favor from this quarter. I fear, sir, they are not certain to obtain bare justice.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania says, these merchants have no equitable claims, because a great part of the goods imported have been purchased since the repeal of the Orders in Council. Sir, I apprehend the gentleman is mistaken, both in the fact and in the conclusion he draws from it. In order to establish his fact, the gentleman begins by attacking the testimony which has been laid before us. He complains that the witnesses were examined before the Committee of Ways and Means, by the Chairman of that committee, with great ability, and all the facts that could be favorable to the petitioners drawn out; while the cross-examination was not sufficiently minute to draw out the facts that might be unfavorable to the petitioners. He also says, he was not disposed to give the witnesses much credit, either for their candor or fairness; and that he had not much confidence in their testimony. Sir, it will be recollected that the gentleman is himself one of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, who made this report; and that its language must be considered as emphatically the language of the gentleman himself. It will be also remembered, that the report was made before debate had excited any sensibility on this subject. And what is the language of that report? Why, that the statements were made by the gentlemen who were examined apparently with so much candor and fairness as induced the committee to give much credit to them. Now, sir, I submit it, whether the honorable gentleman is to be heard to contradict his own report? What do the witnesses say? The committee from New York state expressly that the great mass of purchases were made before the 2d February, 1811, and their testimony is confirmed by all the other witnesses. The gentleman says, that the purchases made before the 2d of November, 1811, could not have amounted to any considerable quantity: because our importations from Great Britain in the Fall and Winter of 1810 were very large. It ought to be recollected that the former non-importation act expired in May 1810; that our exports to Great Britain from the first day of October, 1809, to the 30th of September, 1810, amounted to more than twenty-two millions of dollars; that our exports to Spain and Portugal in the same period amounted to more than eleven millions, and that at least three-fourths of our exports to Spain and Portugal were returned in bills drawn upon England. Is it to be wondered then that our importations from England in the Fall and Winter of 1810 were very large? Does the gentleman believe that all our exports were returned in those importations? It is impossible. But to prove that most of the goods lately imported were purchased since the repeal of the Orders in Council, the gentleman adduces the testimony of the English merchants and manufacturers. It is worthy of remark that he expresses no doubt as to the fairness and candor of their statements, and thus he seems to have full confidence in their testimony. But what do they say? Why, that they had conditional orders for the shipment of goods. Grant that they had, and that all these goods were shipped in consequence of such orders. How can that circumstance alter the equity of this case, when it is well known that the funds which were to pay for those goods were already in England, and could be withdrawn in no other way than by those importations. In my opinion it makes no difference in the equity of this case whether the goods were purchased before the 2d of February, 1811, or between that time and the repeal of the Orders in Council, or since the repeal of those orders. When the merchants show me that these goods were purchased in consequence of orders given previous to the declaration of war, and were paid for by funds already in England, they show me a case with the equity of which I am perfectly satisfied. But I shall say more of this hereafter.

I am opposed to this resolution for various reasons. The President in his Message has recommended this subject to our consideration. The case is before us. The facts are understood. We are competent to decide. It is in our power to do speedy justice, and it is a good objection to this resolution that there is no reason why we should adopt it. What are the simple facts before us? On the 2d day of February, 1811, an act prohibiting the importation of British goods into this country went into operation. The object of the law was by distressing the manufactures of Great Britain to compel her to relinquish her Orders in Council. It is to be presumed that our Government had full faith in the efficacy of this measure; and it was repeatedly and expressly declared that, whenever the Orders in Council should be repealed, the non-importation act should cease to operate. I presume it will not be held to be a crime in our merchants to have hoped that the non-importation act would answer its object, and that the Orders in Council would at some time be repealed. Nor will they be deemed criminal in believing the declarations of our Government that, when the Orders in Council should be repealed, the non-importation act should be suspended. They did so hope, they did so believe, and in the ordinary course of commerce went on to purchase English goods, and to vest their property in funds ready to purchase English goods, giving their agents directions to ship the goods as soon as it might be lawful so to do. To what amount the property of our merchants might have accumulated in England at the time the Orders in Council were repealed, cannot be ascertained probably with much precision. Some estimate may however be formed from the amount of our exports to that country since the non-importation act went into operation.

The amount of exports to Great Britain from October 1, 1810, to September 30, 1811, was - $20,308,211
Our exports to Spain and Portugal during the same period amounted to $18,266,466. It is calculated that at least three-fourths of our exports to Spain and Portugal were returned in bills drawn on England, we may therefore add on this account - - - - - 13,699,848

34,008,059

But our exports are estimated by the value of the articles in our own ports, and must amount to considerably more in a foreign market. I am informed by mercantile men of great respectability that the freight, insurance, and other charges of transportation at a very moderate calculation must amount to at least twenty per cent. upon the value here. We may therefore add on that account -

From the 1st of October, 1810, to the 2d day of February, 1811, there was no non-importation act in force. But if we may suppose that our exports to Spain, Portugal, and England, from October 1, 1811, to April 5, 1812, (when the last embargo was laid,) amounted to as much as they did from October 1, 1810, to February 2, 1811, and it is believed they did to more, we may safely calculate that our merchants have sent to England property to the amount of forty millions of dollars, at least since the 2d February, 1811. On the 23d of June, 1812, the Orders in Council were revoked. The question then arose among the agents of the merchants, whether they might, in pursuance of their orders, lawfully ship goods to this country. In making up an opinion upon this question, they did not rely upon their own views of our laws; they applied to Mr. Russell, the agent of this Government, for advice. Mr. Russell gave it as his opinion, that shipments might be made with safety. They accordingly shipped large quantities of goods to this country. The goods arrived, and were seized by the Government for the violation of the non-importation act. These are the naked facts, and they present to our consideration a question as novel as it is important. Shall we confiscate these goods? Or, in other words, shall we enforce the payment of these bonds? There is a principle in the maritime jurisprudence of England, and I believe of all other nations, which seems to me to be applicable to this case. In order to illustrate it, I will suppose that some of these goods were seized and libelled by the Government on the ground that they were found in a trade between this country and England after a declaration of war. If, upon trial, the Government would show that they were shipped on account of an American merchant after war was declared, by a well settled rule of the law of nations, they would prima facie be liable to condemnation. But if the importer could show that the goods were shipped in consequence of orders given before the declaration, and that it had not been in his power to countermand the shipment, it would be a good defence, and the goods must be cleared. The principle of this defence rests upon the innocence of the importer. So in the case before us; these petitioners show themselves to be entirely innocent. These goods were shipped to this country in consequence of orders that were innocently given; they were shipped without the knowledge or consent of our merchants. And can anybody say that they are guilty of a wilful violation of the non-importation act, and shall forfeit their goods? No guilt can be imputed to them unless you impute the guilt of their agents. I think you are estopped to do that. Because, the same rule that would make them liable for the doings of their agents, ought to make us liable for the doings of our agent. If the agents of those importers have violated the non-importation act, our agent, Mr. Russell, has been at least an accessory before the fact. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that we ought instantly to cancel all bonds that have been given for property bona fide American. I think both justice and equity require it.

It seems to be admitted, on all hands, that the bonds given for goods purchased before the 2d February, 1811, ought to be remitted. I apprehend it can be demonstrated that bonds given for the goods purchased since the repeal of the Orders in Council, with funds already in England, are, in principle, equally entitled to remission. Why are bonds in the first class of cases entitled to remission? If I understand gentlemen, it is because the goods were innocently purchased, the orders for their shipment were innocent, and they were imported through an innocent mistake of the law. The principle rests upon the entire innocence of the importers. The truth is, sir, the facts in this class of cases are too plain and simple to be misunderstood, and the justice of the claim too powerful to be resisted. For such is the nature of the human mind, that prejudice itself cannot prevail against justice, unless the contest be in the dark. I will now endeavor to show that, in principle, there is no difference between these two classes of cases. The non-importation act forbade all persons to import, or to put on board any ship with intent to import from Great Britain to this country any goods, wares, or merchandise whatsoever. In all other respects, it left the commerce of the country free and unshackled. Our merchants were at liberty to export the surplus produce of the country to any part of the world, and to dispose of it as they pleased. They had a right to receive for that produce bills of exchange upon England, or specie; and when they received specie, they had a right to bring it into this country, and here purchase bills of exchange upon England with it, or remit the specie itself to England. Indeed, they were in some measure compelled to place their funds in England, or abandon commerce altogether. It is impossible any man should be so wild and visionary in his politics, as to suppose that the whole surplus produce of this country could be carried to a foreign market and there sold for specie. To confine our produce to such a sale, would be in some measure to deny it a market, and it must inevitably rot in our warehouses, and thereby distress our own country ten times as much as the most enthusiastic votary of the non-importation act could hope that act would distress Great Britain. Individuals not engaged in our export trade had a right also to vest their money in bills of exchange upon England, or remit their money to England in any manner they pleased. And, in doing all this, they sinned neither against the letter nor the spirit of the non-importation act, but innocently pursued the ordinary course of trade. It is true, that those who have purchased goods since the repeal of the Orders in Council, with funds already in England, might have sent those funds there with an intent ultimately to purchase British goods; but they cannot be charged with an intent even to purchase, till it might be lawful to ship goods to this country. The object of the non-importation law was to distress the manufacturers of Great Britain, and thereby compel a repeal of the Orders in Council. Surely the simple act of placing funds in England had no tendency to counteract, but rather to aid that object. For if the manufacturers were really distressed, to know that the funds were ready in the country to purchase their goods, and relieve them, and that a pertinacious adherence of their own Government to the Orders in Council was the only cause why their goods were not instantly purchased, would tend to increase their clamor and discontent, and in fact to aggravate their distress. I therefore consider the position as incontrovertible, that it was as innocent an act to place funds in England after the 2d February, 1811, as it was to purchase goods before that time. The orders given by the merchants to their agents, were in substance the same in both classes of cases. The goods purchased before February 2, 1811, were ordered to be shipped as soon as it might be lawful so to do. The funds were ordered to be vested in goods, and those goods sent to this country as soon as it might be lawful so to do. It only remains to be shown that goods purchased after the repeal of the Orders in Council, might be as innocently shipped to this country as goods purchased before the 2d February, 1811. To purchase goods in England was not prohibited by the non-importation act, though it was not made penal to purchase British goods in this country, knowing them liable to be seized under that act. Those, therefore, who purchased goods after the repeal of the Orders in Council, did not thereby violate any law of this country. To have purchased goods before the repeal of those orders, and while the non-importation act was in operation, might be thought to have a tendency to counteract the object of that act, by relieving British manufacturers. But surely after the Orders in Council were repealed, and the only avowed object of the non-importation act obtained, an American merchant might very innocently suppose that he did not, by purchasing English goods, do an act that had any tendency whatever to counteract the views of his own Government. I think I may safely affirm, then, that these goods were innocently purchased. Where then is the difference in the two classes of cases with regard to the shipment of the goods? I see none. Both were shipped under an idea that it was lawful to ship goods to this country; both were shipped with the advice and consent of Mr. Russell; both were shipped against the letter of the law, and under the same misapprehension of the law. How then is the importer in the one case innocent, and in the other not? It cannot be—there is in principle no distinction between them.

H. OF R.

Merchants' Bonds.

DECEMBER, 1812.

I will now proceed to compare the case of goods purchased between February 2, 1811, and June 2, 1812, with that of goods purchased previous to February 2, 1811. The only difference between this class of cases, and that of goods purchased after June 23, 1812, is in the single circumstance of the time of purchase; and the same remarks which have been applied to that class of goods, are in all other respects applicable to this. The question is, ought that circumstance to make a difference? It may be admitted, that to purchase goods in England after the non-importation act came into operation, and before the Orders in Council were repealed, had in some degree a tendency to counteract the views of this Government.

But, sir, I hold it to be a plain and obvious maxim, that in a free State no citizen is bound to take notice of the views and policy of the Government, any farther than those views and that policy are clearly and plainly expressed in the laws of the land. To punish a man for an act done not contrary to law, but to the supposed views and policy of the Government, would be the very essence of tyranny. To the laws, and the laws only, are our citizens to look for our policy; so far as the laws go, so far are they bound to obey, but no farther. Adopt any other rule, and we have fought in vain—in vain have we bled for freedom—our Government is essentially tyrannical. What could our citizens find in our laws on this subject? Why, sir, they could find, that it was unlawful to import from Great Britain to the United States any goods, wares, or merchandise, whatever; that it was unlawful to ship them with an intent to import them into the United States; and that it was unlawful to purchase in this country any goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into this country contrary to law, knowing them to be so imported. This is all they could find. They found no prohibition against the purchase of goods in England, with an intent to ship them to this country as soon as it might be lawful to ship them. They were not, therefore, bound to take notice that such an act would remotely tend to thwart the views of this Government. This is the only circumstance that can make any difference in principle, between this class of cases and the other two. Unless then a rule, which is in itself most tyrannical and oppressive, is to be applied to this class, I may safely conclude that the three classes are in principle substantially the same, and that, unless we are false to our own principles, if we remit in one case we shall remit in all.

With regard to bonds given for merchandise shipped entirely on British account, I say nothing. I stand not here the advocate of any Briton; I plead only the cause of the honest American merchant. Do with the subjects of Great Britain as you please; but spare, I implore you, spare, your own citizens.

Good policy, in my opinion, requires that we should freely remit in all cases that are bona fide American. The merchants are a powerful class of the community, and ought at this crisis to be conciliated. At least we ought not to irritate them by reading to them the bloody book of the law in the bitter letter. Depend upon it, sir, our decision will be considered as evidence of our disposition towards commerce. These petitioners are comparatively few in number, but the merchants will consider it as a common cause.

These importers have placed an honorable confidence in the justice of their Government. They refused the aid which our privateers offered, to enable them to evade our laws; conscious of the uprightness of their intentions, they have openly, and in the face of day, brought these goods into the country, and placed them in our hands, trusting that their own Government would not rob them of goods, which even an enemy had spared.

Sir, it would be disgraceful to betray a confidence so honorably and freely placed in us. But if gentlemen still think that we want money; that we ought to enforce the payment of these bonds, because we have the power to do it, I have only to beg them to remember, that it is excellent to have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said, that he had participated with the Committee in the pleasure which they must have derived from the splendid exhibition of eloquence made by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES.) He wished it had been unmingled with regret. But when he saw the honorable gentleman assailing, with his powerful talents, what he deemed an essential system of policy, he felt constrained, however incompetent to the task, to attempt its vindication. The gentleman appeared, indeed, to arraign the whole of the measures pursued by this Government for several years past, in reference to foreign Powers, though he knew his private sentiments to be in favor of the embargo. [Here Mr. CHEVES stated that, in speaking of the restrictive system, he did not mean to include the embargo, which he always thought a wise measure.] Mr. CLAY thought a concession in its favor admitted the propriety of the law of non-importation.

What is the principle of these restrictive measures? It is to create such a pressure on the foreign nation as would compel it to revoke its anti-neutral edicts. The embargo aimed to accomplish this purpose, by not only withholding supplies of the first necessity, but, at the same time, shutting up our market against the manufactures of the aggressors. The act of non-importation was, upon certain contingencies, substituted for it, and it left the export trade free, whilst it pressed upon the foreign nation, by an exclusion of her manufactures. In this respect, he thought it a measure fraught with more wisdom than the embargo, which, however, he had no doubt would have produced its effect, if it had been persisted in. Neither was designed to impair commercial enterprise. Far from it. The friends of both contemplated the emancipation of commerce from its unjust shackles. Commerce was suspended for the moment, that it might revive with more freedom and energy. The bow was unstrung, that it might acquire fresh vigor and new elasticity. And he considered that the proudest triumph which the friends of the restrictive system could enjoy, was the recent revocation of the Orders in Council—a revocation which neither regard for the laws of nations, nor a desire to preserve the peace and harmony of the two countries, could effect, but what that very pressure produced by the law of non-importation had achieved. Yes, the distress, the cries of the manufacturers—their haggard looks, produced by the operation of that law, had at length ascended to a corrupt Ministry, and occasioned a reluctant abandonment of those orders. Every deposition given in the House of Commons, on the late examination before that body, on this subject, was a panegyric on our interdiction of British manufactures. He would trouble the committee with one which he had just laid his hands upon. [Here Mr. C. read the deposition of W. Thompson.] And yet we are now called upon to abandon this system! We wanted firmness. We are deficient in the virtues of patience and perseverance. The embargo would have attained its object. It was, in a moment of panic, prematurely abandoned. And now, that the non-importation law has been demonstrated, by unerring experience, as capable of effecting its original design, we are asked to relinquish that also. He feared we should, in the same manner, get tired of the war. He viewed the restrictive system as a powerful auxiliary of the war. You may be defeated by sea and land. Your northwestern army may be ingloriously surrendered, (it did not become him here to say from what causes.) In another quarter of the Union your army, by fraud and chicanery, may be robbed of its recruits. The physical force of the country may be withheld, upon novel and dangerous constructions of the Constitution, menacing the total subversion of Government. Opposition, transcending all legitimate bounds, may be carried to the very confines, themselves, of treason. That base, degenerate spirit may exist, which, incapable of patriotic struggles itself, questions and derides the motives of those who nobly step forth in their country's cause—a flagitious spirit, which has been seen to assail the standing of two of his honorable colleagues, because they exhibited the more than Roman example in shouldering their muskets and flying to the protection of the frontiers, against a most savage alliance. But if you cling to the restrictive system, it is incessantly working in your favor.

But his friend from South Carolina had contended that we had thrice this session decided against this system, by refusing to entertain the proposition for an embargo. Mr. C. could not agree with him. He admitted, that a trade, in exportation only, could not subsist without a corresponding import trade, either in specie or commodities. But he denied that it must, necessarily, be in the forbidden fruit—English manufactures. He was free to declare that the exact limit to which he wished to see the export trade carried (until our rights are acknowledged) was the specie and commutables, other than British, into which its proceeds could be converted. What that limit was, Congress must determine. It must be left to regulate itself. He was opposed, therefore, to the embargo recently proposed. He was desirous that the merchants, acquiescing in the policy of their Government, should not continue heedlessly taking in payment for their cargoes to the Peninsula bills on London—thus placing their capital in the power of the enemy. If they persisted in it, he was for their doing it at their peril. Taking nothing but specie, or merchandise other than of British production, the restrictive system would distress the enemy, not only by closing an important market for his manufactures, but by exhausting his specie. For whilst he keeps up his large armies upon the Continent, subsistence must be obtained for them at any sacrifice, and if bills will not procure it, specie must be employed. A stream of specie, equal to twenty millions of dollars, the estimated amount of our exports to the Peninsula, continually flowing from any country, would soon exhaust it of the precious metals. Much less than this would endanger the stability of the paper system in Great Britain.

The gentleman from South Carolina says, that the manufacturing class in that country is inconsiderable—that the American consumption is not more than one-sixth of the exports of British manufactures. My friend's error consists in separating that class from, and carrying it against, the whole mass of British population. It is unfair, in estimating its consequence, to look only to the divided effect of which it is capable. It ought to be viewed as a co-operating portion of opposition. In that country there will always exist an opposition. And the question is, What quantum of weight will be thrown, by the discontents of the manufacturers, into the scale of that opposition, which is made up of the friends of Irish emancipation, the friends of parliamentary reform, those who are opposed to the Continental war, and that system of corruption and burden of taxes existing in that country. He believed, if persisted in, the restrictive system, aiding the war, would break down the present Ministry, and lead to a consequent honorable peace.

The gentleman deplores the gloom and distress which hover over our cities, and which he attributes to the restrictive system. Indeed had a stranger, unacquainted with their actual condition, heard his lamentations, he would have concluded that the melancholy state of ruin which they present is but little short of that of the famed Balbec and Palmyra. But what is the fact? Their growth and prosperity are without example. Where are to be found your magnificent palaces—your splendid equipages, your sumptuous villas—all the luxury of wealth? In these same pining, desolated cities, and their vicinities. It was, however, due to candor to say, that perhaps, next to New Orleans, the city of Charleston (of which his friend was the representative) has suffered more than any other by the shackles upon commerce. But he denied that it resulted from the measures of our Government. No, the gentleman has mistaken the cause of the disease. It flowed from the anti-neutral edicts. It proceeded from cutting off the market for the staple commodity of South Carolina. If it be true, as he has already admitted it was, that an export trade could not exist without an import trade, the converse of the proposition was no less undeniable. Suppose then the non-importation law not to have existed, how would Charleston or South Carolina have been able to sustain a trade in importation only? Cut off as she has been from a market for her cotton, where would she have found the means to pay for foreign articles? The immutable laws of trade would have created for that State a natural non-importation, if the Legislature had not prescribed it. If it be urged that she has enjoyed, in her rice and indigo,

H. or R.

(though the culture of this latter article has almost ceased,) some export trade, it is no less true that she has had the benefit of a corresponding, and probably an equivalent trade in importation from other countries than Great Britain.

It was remarkable to observe the inconsistency of the opponents of the restrictive system. Sometimes it was said to operate exclusively on the mercantile class. Then it was the agricultural class that bore its whole burden. He admitted that, if the export trade were limited in the manner he had suggested, this system would ultimately react upon agriculture. It was, however, but a temporary sacrifice, which that class was prepared to make for the permanent freedom of trade. We had heard of no complaints, received no petitions from that quarter. The great agricultural State of Pennsylvania, and other similar sections, were patient and patriotic. The time when it was proposed to relinquish this system, was not less impolitic than the proposition itself. If the benefits expected from it were even doubtful, this certainly was the period best calculated to test its value. Perhaps, at this moment, the fate of the North of Europe is decided, and the French Emperor may be dictating the law from Moscow. The British trade shut out from the Baltic, excluded from the continent of Europe, possibly expelled the Black Sea, perishing in South America, its illicit avenue to the United States, through Canada, closed; was this the period for throwing open our market, by abandoning our restrictive system?

He would next proceed to examine the claim of the petitioners to relief. And here he felt himself constrained to acknowledge that he had never been more embarrassed in the consideration of any subject whatever; he was impelled, on the one hand, by an almost irresistible disposition to grant the relief asked for; and, on the other, he had the strongest conviction of the utility of the restrictive system, and the necessity of clinging to it. The difficulty lay in reconciling an act of liberality to individuals with the public interest. Their case undoubtedly presented powerful pretensions to the generosity of Government. What was it? The repeal of our non-importation law had been made to depend upon the revocation of the Orders in Council. If they were so revoked, or so modified as that they ceased to violate our neutral rights, the President was required to declare the fact, by his proclamation, and then our law ceased. It was immaterial whether Great Britain repealed or modified her orders. It was immaterial what was the manner of repealing or modifying them. All that our law demanded was, whether the one or the other, in whatever form the repeal or modification was ordained, the repealing or modifying instrument should produce a given effect. It was not to be denied that the order of the Prince Regent, of the 23d June last, would have produced this effect. It satisfied our law. It was quite a different question, whether, independent of the law, it was such an abandonment of their system as he would require. He entertained no doubt that it would have been the bounden duty of the Chief Magistrate, if the two countries had remained at peace, to have issued the proclamation enjoined by our law. He would have had no discretion upon the subject. He had only to look at the operation of the Prince Regent's order, and it was such as our law had required. Mr. C. did not doubt that the British Government intended, by the condition with which it was coupled, to urge hereafter our implied consent to those Orders in Council, whenever it might determine to revive them. But the President could not have been restrained, by any such sinister design, from the performance of a positive duty. In the case of the arrangement, first with Mr. Erskine, and afterwards with the French Government, the manner in which the aggressive edicts of the respective countries was discontinued, was far from being unexceptionable. The President, however, looking to the substance of things, issued on both those occasions his proclamation, and he was right in doing so. Whether, therefore, the American merchant or his agent in England, prior to a knowledge there of the declaration of war, adverted to the terms of the law, the practice of our Government, on similar occasions, or the correspondence between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster, he would have been equally brought to the conclusion that the revocation of the Orders in Council in England, would have been followed by the repeal here of our non-importation law. Under these circumstances shipments were made. And, what puts the question beyond dispute, is, that the President, in the Message delivered at the opening of the present session, has said that the order of revocation was susceptible of explanations satisfying this Government.

Mr. C. thought that, in all cases, where the departure of the vessels from British ports was prior to a knowledge there of the war, relief ought to be afforded. Official information of that event, it appears, was received on the 10th of August. The shipments made, prior to that time, were made when the repeal of our law might have been fairly anticipated, and under ignorance of its continued existence. A still stronger class of cases, is that which consists of purchasers prior to the 2d of February, 1811. They bought, when the trade was unrestricted, and of course violated neither the prohibitory provisions of the law, nor the policy of the Government. When, by the President's proclamation of the 2d day of November, 1810, it became unlawful to introduce their goods subsequent to the 2d of February, they abstained from their introduction. While they ordered their goods not to be shipped from Great Britain, and thus abided by and conformed to the law, as good citizens, others violated the law and introduced their goods after the 2d of February, 1811. These were relieved from the forfeitures and penalties which they had incurred by the law of the ensuing month, prescribing as the rule the time of departure from the British ports, and not the arrival in America of the vessel. Shall we, then, thus suffer the violators of the law to escape, and punish its observers?

With regard to all who shipped after the 1st of August, the plea of ignorance of the continuance of the non-importation cannot be urged. They knew they were acting contrary to law. They were fully apprized of the fact, too, that this House had refused, before the declaration of war, to suspend the operation of the law. They were, probably, also informed that, after that event, propositions to repeal and modify it were rejected. The state of war itself rendered the trade unlawful. It was in vain to say they did not intend to violate the law. It was a palpable, wilful, undisguised violation. Remit the forfeitures in their case, and your law is virtually repealed. What is the present course of the trade, said Mr. C., to the Peninsula? It is to place American capital in Great Britain, which is constantly accumulating there. Its return can only be effected in British commodities. Having said to one class of shippers, after the war, that they shall be exonerated, how will you hereafter refuse another when they shall present themselves before you? Precedents are dangerous. The human mind, in a state of difficulty and embarrassment, was prone to take refuge under them. Remit, in all cases, as had been contended for, and you let in a flood, deluging the empire of the law, against which your utmost wisdom and sagacity will be unable to provide a competent embankment.

As to the terms on which relief was to be afforded or withheld, he was decidedly of opinion that there ought to be no conditions. The law ought to be enforced or not. He thought a compromise in the case dangerous and undignified. Indeed he felt shocked at the idea of an equivalent. Already are our laws too openly violated or fraudulently eluded. Shall we degrade them still further by carrying them into the market, and fixing a price upon their violation? Extend the principle of an equivalent from cases of prohibition merely to instances of moral turpitude—to felony and homicide—and every gentleman will see its enormity. No, sir, let us not pollute our hands with this welfild.

The proposed equivalent contemplates taking from the merchant his extraordinary profit, leaving him the ordinary profit; fixing, therefore, a rule for future violations. Now, the ordinary profit is exactly that with which the merchant, in a regular course of trade, will be contented. He will trade with alacrity under the firm of the United States & Co., if you will leave him his customary profits, taking only the excess. But he would ask, if the firm gets into complete operation, what would become of the extra profit? Holding the opinion that he did in favor of the law of non-importation, he felt himself under the necessity of defending it no less against the open assaults of its avowed enemies, than the effects of the principle contended for by its professed friends. He was alone the solitary—he feared feeble—advocate of the law. The consequence of a general remission of the forfeitures was its virtual repeal. The consequence also of the equivalent contended for, by fixing as a standard the extraordinary profit, was its virtual repeal.

He was for a remission in the specified cases, where remission appeared to him to be due. He was for an enforcement of the law in all other cases. He was opposed to the establishment of a principle which, if practised upon, and he did not see how it was not to be, if once adopted, under the delusive idea of taking the extraordinary profit, most completely prostrated the law.

But this principle of an equivalent was unjust, or impracticable in operation. One merchant has imported a gainful cargo, another a losing one. The same merchant has imported one parcel of merchandise on which he has made profit, and another on which he has sustained a loss; will you estimate the profit only, or take into view both profit and loss? How can you adapt any general rule to this variety of cases? Again: The extraordinary profits made upon the late importations result from the demand being greater than the supply. They will be divided between the importer, the jobber, and the retailer. Will each be compelled to relinquish his portion? And if not, upon what principle of equality can you take from the one and not the other? If it be urged, that the importers only have violated the law, it must be allowed, that the others are in the condition of accessaries after the fact.

He would touch an incidental question which had been started, and cease with, he feared, his unprofitable discourse. It had been questioned, whether Congress had the power to remit the moiety of forfeitures claimed by the officers making the seizure. The law which creates the forfeiture, reserves the unqualified power of remitting the whole or any part. It is true, that it has vested that power, for convenience sake, in the Secretary of the Treasury. Congress may, however, abolish that office entirely, and place all its functions in some new institution, or, without abolishing the office, it may transfer the remitting power, or resume it themselves. In all these instances, it would be a mere change of tribunal. The principles which would guide in a decision of the question of remission, it is to be presumed, would be those of justice, and that is all the parties affected have a right to expect. If there be cases in England, where the Crown is supposed not to be authorized to remit the informer's part of a penalty, he apprehended, on investigation, it would be found to proceed from the power of remission not being reserved to the Government in the law denouncing the penalty, as it is in our laws. Mr. C. concluded by submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That as far as respects the case of citizens of the United States who purchased goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth, production, or manufacture of Great Britain, prior to the 2d of February, 1811, and of citizens of the United States who shipped similar goods between the 23d day of June and the first day of August, the petitioners ought to be relieved by a remission of the forfeitures and penalties which they have incurred, upon payment of legal costs; and that on all other cases of the petitioners, a recovery of the forfeitures and penalties incurred ought to be enforced.

H. OF R.

Mr. McKim said, I beg the indulgence of the committee, while I offer a few observations on the subject under consideration. I would not have troubled the Committee with any remarks on the subject that has already been fully and ably discussed, did I not see principles contended for that, in my judgment, must lead to an erroneous decision. Under these impressions, I deem it a duty I owe my constituents not to suffer a question to be taken in which their interests are so deeply concerned, without presenting my views to the Committee.

Mr. Chairman, in considering the question immediately before the Committee, whether we will adopt the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and refer the petitioners back to the Secretary of the Treasury, the whole merit of the petition is brought into view; and another question is presented to the mind, namely—whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the petitioners have committed such an offence against the laws as will authorize an exaction of the penalties? and to this point my observations will principally be directed.

Mr. Chairman, in the view I take of the subject, I discard all calculations on the profits of the petitioners, as having no bearing on the question to be decided. The profits go with the ownership of the goods that produce them; and, whether the profits were great or small, it can have no effect in deciding a question of right between an individual and the Government. It has, indeed, been intimated, that the extraordinary profits made by the petitioners on these goods, accrued from the existence of the non-importation law, which precluded any serious competition in the market; and therefore it is reasonable that the petitioners should yield up to the Government the extraordinary profits so accruing.

Mr. Chairman, this does not appear to me a correct view of the subject. The law was not passed for the benefit of the petitioners, but for the public good; and if individuals have accidentally derived an extraordinary profit from the existence of a law passed for the public good, they are entitled to hold it. But the rule, to be good, must work both ways. If it be just to take from the petitioners the increased profits that have accrued from the existence of one restrictive law, then it will be just to indemnify them for losses sustained by the operation of other restrictive laws; and, in this view of the subject, the balance will be largely against the Government. I cannot decide this question by the counting-house principle of profit and loss; but by the principles of justice, and of national policy, it must be all or nothing—there must be a forfeiture or a release.

Mr. Chairman, the petitioners come before Congress as violators of the law; they confess that they have imported goods that were prohibited by law; and, unless circumstances can be shown that will bear their case out of the general principle, the penalties of the law must be inflicted. I am not prepared to pass an act of grace in their favor, if they be guilty. But if they have incurred penalties without guilt, I am ready, as far as my vote will go, to relieve them. What, then, were the circumstances under which the petitioners imported these goods? and what were the motives that induced them to import goods prohibited by law?

Mr. Chairman, I will answer this question by a concise history of the transaction: The petitioners had their property in England to a large amount—to an amount that in many instances, if lost, would be ruinous to them—a war with England was confidently expected to be on the point of breaking out. They saw their property in danger of confiscation if it remained in the enemy's country; and if not confiscated, that it must remain there during the period of the war. In either case they could see nothing but ruin. And if they brought their property home in the face of the law, it could not be worse with them—it could only be ruin. In this difficulty and choice of dangers, the property was shipped; the petitioners chose rather to rely on their own Government for favor and indulgence than on the enemy. These goods had been ordered upwards of two years ago; and remittances made, in payment of a large portion of them, when it was lawful to order, and to pay for goods in that country; but they were prevented from getting them home by the non-importation act. On the 23d of June last, the British Orders in Council were revoked; and it was generally understood that the non-importation act would cease with such revocation. The case was pressing with the petitioners; the apprehension of war was great; and the agents of the petitioners in England, without waiting to know whether the revocation of the Orders in Council was satisfactory to this Government, shipped the goods; but, before they arrived, war had intervened; the non-importation act was not repealed, and the goods were seized on their arrival in this country.

Mr. Chairman, these goods, while in England, were in the hands of agents there, and subject to their disposal; they were out of the power and control of the American owners. The owners had no agency in giving them that direction that wrought the forfeiture contended for; on the contrary, the American owners (the petitioners) did everything that was in their power to prevent a violation of the law. Their uniform instructions to their agents were, not to ship their goods to this country while the Orders in Council remained in force; for, as I have already said, it was understood that the non-importation law would cease with the revocation of these orders. In addition to the testimony referred to by the Committee in their report, going to prove the respect for the laws, that governed the conduct of the petitioners in this transaction, I beg leave to read, from a report of the examinations in Parliament on the subject of the Orders in Council, sundry letters from American merchants, all which forbid the shipment of their goods, until the Orders in Council were repealed. These letters, written without any view to have a bearing on the question before this Committee, brought forward in another country, and for another purpose, is evidence of a high character; and, so far as it goes, tends to acquit the petitioners of any intention to introduce these goods in violation of the laws of their country.

H. OF R.

Mr. Chairman, these goods were not attempted to be smuggled into the country; no, they came boldly, in confidence that the prohibition of British manufactures had ceased with the revocation of the Orders in Council; and in confidence, that if the prohibition had not, by any formal act, been repealed, their goods, fleeing from the grasp of the enemy, would not be confiscated on entering their own country. Was it a crime for the petitioners thus to withdraw their property, on the event of a war, from the enemy's country, where it was in such danger of being lost to the owners; where it might have been employed by the enemy to carry on a war against us; and to place it in their own country, where it has yielded a handsome revenue to the Government; and where it may otherwise be usefully employed for the benefit of the nation? Surely this was not a crime. And I would ask, is there an honorable gentleman in this House, that would not have pursued the same course, under similar circumstances? And shall we punish others for what we, under similar circumstances, would have thought it right to have done? I hope not. There is in the whole of this transaction a want of that intention to commit a crime that is essential to the very nature of guilt; and without guilt, I hope the American Government will not set the example of inflicting punishment. It is the intention, or motive, that marks the character of an act; and not the act itself. If I break into a house with intention to commit a crime, (say murder or robbery,) the very act of breaking into the house is a crime punishable by the laws, although the murder or robbery was not committed. But if the house be on fire, and I break in for the purpose of saving the family, or to prevent the spread of that destructive element, it will be no crime; no punishment will be inflicted, because there was no intention to do a criminal act. And the petitioners appear before this committee under circumstances equally free from guilt, and equally entitled to be exempt from punishment.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that the letter of the law has been broken, goods have been brought into the country contrary to its provisions; but under such circumstances of necessity, such apprehensions of ruin to the owners, if they were not brought; and with such purity of intention on their part, as ought, in my opinion, to avoid the penalties. The case of the American ship Horizon will be remembered. At a time when British manufactures were prohibited in France, this ship, laden with British manufactures, was thrown on the coast of France by an act of Providence—where the vessel and cargo were confiscated, under the prohibitory decree. Gentlemen will remember the universal indignation that was excited by this inhuman act. It is true that the goods were not brought into this country by an act of Providence: but the owners generally had as little agency in bringing them in, as the owners of the Horizon had in casting that ship on the coast of France. I hope the American Government will not sanction a procedure so nearly assimilated to one on which we have bestowed so much censure.

Mr. Chairman, I ask, what is there in this transaction that will warrant a forfeiture of the petitioners' property, thus brought into the country, notwithstanding the non-importation law was not repealed? The whole of the business was transacted by agents in England, over whose acts the American owners could have no control. No fraud was intended, no crime was committed, no injury was done to the public or to individuals—both were benefited. But the law was broken. How? By the entry into our ports of goods, American property, drawn from the enemy's country on the eve of war, under apprehensions of seizure, and fleeing as it were from the grasp of the enemy. These goods, if they had remained in the enemy's country, might have been turned against us, they might have been converted into a means of carrying on the war. They have been brought home, and have yielded a large sum to the revenue; and otherwise have contributed to the convenience and resources of the public and of individuals; and shall property brought into the country, under circumstances of such necessity, and apprehension of danger, be forfeited? I hope not. I hope the Representatives of a free people will never sanction a procedure so cruel, not to say unjust.

Mr. Chairman, it may be asked, what objection can there be to a reference of this case to the Secretary of the Treasury, under the existing law empowering him to mitigate fines, penalties, and forfeitures, as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means? Although I have the highest respect for the honorable Secretary, and no gentleman, I am sure, has greater confidence in his integrity and talents than I have, yet, as he has declined to act in the business, and the petitioners have thought proper to bring their case before Congress, I, for one, am not willing to turn a deaf ear to their complaint, and refer them back to the Secretary or to any other tribunal. I am disposed to decide on their case. I do not think it wise or compatible with the principles of our civil institutions to leave cases of such magnitude to the decision of one man, however wise, capable, and virtuous, he may be; he may err; a degree of imperfection attaches to human nature in its best and most improved state. In most of the States, it has been thought expedient to limit the sum on which an individual might legally decide to a mere trifle. Few, if any, of the States, suffer the amount of one hundred dollars to be decided on, without a jury of twelve men; and will this Committee, in a case amounting to twenty millions of dollars, and involving the fate of an entire class of citizens, turn it over to the decision of one man? I hope not.

Mr. Chairman, a distinction has been set up between cases of goods shipped before a knowledge of the war in England, and those shipped after a knowledge of that event. To my view there is little difference between these classes; and the latter class appears to me the most entitled to indulgence. The principal reason for a release of the penalties in the former case, is the apprehension of danger, under which the goods were shipped; and this danger was not diminished by a knowledge that war had taken place; on the contrary it was increased; what was apprehended in the former case, was realized in the latter; war had broken out, and the petitioners' property, lying in the enemy's country, was exposed to all the dangers that result from a state of war. I cannot agree to this distinction as a principle of decision. If a distinction is to be made, it ought to operate on purchases made after a knowledge of the war, and not on the shipment. But I do not think a line can well be drawn.

DECEMBER, 1812.

Merchants' Bonds.

Mr. Chairman, it has been intimated that the petitioners have covered the forfeitures in the sales of their goods; that they have sold at prices that will enable them to pay the forfeitures; that they have in this indirect manner levied a tax on the consumers, in the amount of their respective proportions of the forfeiture, and that it would be unjust to remit the forfeitures to the petitioners, and again tax the consumers for money to meet the expenses of the Government. I do not think that statement correct; I do not think the forfeitures have generally been covered by the sales; but if they were, I would observe, that the petitioners are also consumers, that they live generally in commercial cities, that they raise nothing from the soil for the clothing or provision of their families, and of course consume largely of imported articles, and as consumers have borne their full proportion of the forfeitures, and will participate on equal terms with others in any new tax that may be laid.

Mr. Chairman, it has been observed, that a release of the penalties in this case would break down the restrictive system on which so much reliance has been placed. That we could not, after such release, exact penalties from others who may hereafter contravene the laws. I confess I do not see the force of this objection; the petitioners have a claim to indulgence that cannot again be set up; their goods were brought into the country under an impression of an immediate war, to get them out of the enemy's power, and under a persuasion that our prohibitory law had ceased to operate. These are circumstances that cannot again happen, and that plead loudly in favor of the petitioners; the danger is now known; none can fall into it unawares; none can hereafter plead a like necessity.

Mr. Chairman, under every view I have been able to take of the subject, it appears to me that the petitioners are certainly entitled to relief, and under this impression I am disposed to give my vote against the report of the committee, and if the proposition mentioned by the honorable chairman of that committee, for a general release in all cases of American property, shall be brought forward, I will give it my firm support.

At 3 o'clock the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 8.

Another member, viz: from Virginia, WILLIAM A. BURWELL, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill "making an appropriation to defray expenses incurred, or to be incurred, under an act, entitled, "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States," reported the agreement of the committee to the said amendments.

The amendments were then read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. McKEE, the letter from the Secretary of State of the 3d of July, 1812, enclosing his report on the memorial of William Lambert of Virginia, relating to a first meridian for the United States, was referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise. Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. PITKIN, Mr. SEYBERT, Mr. McKEE, and Mr. CALHOUN, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, a committee was appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, amendments are necessary to the acts extending jurisdiction, in certain cases, to the Superior Courts of the several Territories of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. HYNEMAN, and Mr. SUTGES, were appointed the committee.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the merchants' petition.

Mr. WIDGERY.—Mr. Chairman, we have been several days on this business of the bonds, and the chief of your time has been taken up in an investigation of the merchants' accounts, and examining letters, to prove their loss and gain; this appears to me to be raising a phantom for the purpose of showing our valor in fighting it. What possible bearing can this calculation have on the question before the House, except to ascertain how much the merchant could afford to give to be let off, and thence by establishing the price for the crime of which, gentlemen are pleased to say, the merchant is guilty. Sir, are you willing to take seven years, and average the loss and gain; are you willing to restore to wealth and affluence the thousand merchants who have become bankrupt by venturing to sea? The answer will be, No—and a very proper one. Government ought to have nothing to do with the loss of the merchant; in this all will agree. Will not the same reasoning apply as to his gain? It appears to me it will. What assistance does Government give the merchant now? Not a single convoy, even along shore; not in a single instance have their vessels or property been convoyed; they are left to their fate. They launch off into an ocean of uncertainty; their adventures have given you five million and a half of dollars, without which you must have resorted to a land tax to support your war. The honorable Speaker, yesterday, when on the floor, although for remitting in part, thought he must be in fashion, and give the merchants a shot, as he passed. In answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, who had mentioned the distress of the seaports, he pointed you to their rich furniture and costly equipage. Here, I thought, the honorable Speaker had forgotten himself, for if that was to be the criterion by which to squeeze money from the citizens, the Speaker would be squeezed very hard, for I know of no man who rolls on the wheels of luxury in more magnificent style than does the honorable Speaker. At the last session of Congress, when the question was brought before the House, to allow the importation of British goods, I was opposed to it, because I then thought it was impolitic in the extreme to relieve England in a case which, of all others, most distressed her, that of confining her manufactures at home. In the present case the goods are here, and whether you take the advantage of the bonds or not, remit or not, it is immaterial to the British manufacturer; he has got pay for them; no advantage, therefore, which you may take of the bonds can injure your enemy, except in those instances where the British merchant may have consigned to orders, in which case, I am willing to admit, they are British goods until delivered, if shipped by a British subject. When the gentleman from Kentucky was up, in support of the report of the committee, after he had read over many letters from the merchants' counting rooms and compared them, and attempted to show their disagreements, but to no purpose, from the goodness of his heart he was pleased to carry the merchants into a court of chancery to examine their errors, in a case that could have no possible bearing on the question before the House. Sir, I ask for the merchant no such favor; I am willing they should be tried by the rigid rules of law, not the mere letter of the law, but according to the spirit and true meaning thereof; and, for this purpose, I am willing to take the highest crime the law knows of, homicide: A man is found dead in the street, a coroner's jury is summoned to inquire how the man came by his death, they bring in a verdict for wilful murder, the perpetrator is taken, the grand jury indict for wilful murder. Here, then, were no further proceeding to be had in the case, the perpetrator must receive sentence of death. Both these juries have acted according to the letter of the law. But he has another chance for his life before an impartial jury, where he has a right to challenge all whom he may think has aught against him, to the amount of twenty-four, without giving a reason, and as many men as he can give to the court good reasons for challenging. Sir, I think if the merchants had the same right here, it would leave a very thin House.

The jury is empannelled—this jury is to try the cause, according to law and the evidence given them. This I call the spirit and intention of the law. In this action the jury may give either of their verdicts—if the killing was without excuse, they may give a verdict of guilty; if, though violently attacked, it appears to the jury that the prisoner might have escaped without killing his assailant, they may give a verdict for manslaughter; or, if necessary to the saving his own life, the prisoner killed his assailant, they may give a verdict of not guilty: it being what the law calls excusable homicide. And this doctrine of excusable homicide has been carried much further. If a man in the street is pursued by a person, who, he thinks, has a design to kill or injure him, he may turn and kill his pursuer; and, though on trial it turns out in evidence that the pursuer was innocent, if it appears to the jury that any circumstance or situation in which the prisoner stood, immediately antecedent to the killing, he had good grounds or reason for his suspicion, they may give in their verdict not guilty: this being, according to the spirit of the law, excusable homicide. This last case will, I apprehend, be thought, by some of my hearers, a very extraordinary one; but I will put a case which, in a moment, will convince them: A man, having long black hair, paints himself like an Indian, to prevent their shooting him as he passes them in ambush; in his travelling through a wood, he hears an Indian yell; he starts: in his flight is discovered by a white man ahead, who, thinking himself pursued by an Indian, shoots him dead on the spot; will not every man excuse him?

Will this Committee refuse the merchant as fair a chance as they would give to a man indicted for murder? Kind Heaven, forbid it! It cannot be so—this Temple of Freedom cannot so soon be thus polluted. Suffer me, then, to state the case of the merchants; and to show to this Committee that they are not guilty of those factitious and treasonable actions, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania was pleased to mention on Saturday, in the course of his observations. But here I would remark that the gentleman from Pennsylvania acknowledges himself to have been in an error last session, in voting to admit British goods, and has asked pardon of his constituents for the error he has committed. I have no doubt the gentleman then acted from the purest motives, and was as sure then that he was doing right, as he is now; but, having detected himself in an error last session, he ought to recollect that, what has been may be again; and, however sanguine the gentleman may now be, that he is right, in the opinion he has formed against the merchants, let him remember that the apostle Paul, through his over-zeal, thought he was doing God service when he persecuted the church of Christ. I mention these things to show how liable mankind are to err, and how careful we ought to be when deciding on cases of great magnitude—we ought to divest ourselves of all interested motives, hear patiently, and decide with candor. The tax of the planter ought never to have been brought into this debate. These are considerations foreign from the question before the House. The real question before the House is, has the merchant violated the true spirit and meaning of the laws of his country? I wish to be understood as meaning those only who are American citizens, and who imported only their own property; for those, I plead not guilty. I will endeavor to show that they are as innocent as the man who killed his pursuer. As to a violation of the non-importation law—if such a law existed—sir, the non-importation law was made to injure England, and to compel her to do us justice without resorting to arms—it did not answer the purpose—we were obliged to declare war, and, in the act declaring war, I am of opinion that the non-importation law was absorbed or merged. If so, there can be no violation of a dead letter. To import, means to bring in; the law alluded to was made to prevent the bringing in British manufactured goods. When you declared war, every armed ship, public and private, had a right, by the laws of war, to bring in all kinds of goods manufactured in Great Britain or her dependencies; and, unless you can show that the non-importation law is saved by some clause in the act declaring war, it is superseded; and, if so, the citizens have a right by treaty to bring in their property for a given time after the war. But, sir, I will consider the case in another point of view; and, if you please, say the war did not do away the non-importation law, which was, as I before observed, made to injure England. Would she be injured by buying her goods, and paying for them, and leaving them within her reach, that she might, after being once paid, seize them, and thus make a double advantage? Certainly not. It would be more in compliance with the spirit of the non-importation law, to bring them off, and in strict compliance with the laws of war. But it has been said the merchant broke or violated your laws, while in England. Sir, a merchant from this country has a right when in England, or any other country, to trade in any article of merchandise, not contrary to the law of the nation with whom he resides; he is without your jurisdiction; your law cannot reach him for anything done there, unless you prove the intention, and that he carries it into effect. Hence, I conclude that a man, when he buys goods, has as good a right to store them in his ship as in any other place. Nor will either the purchase or the putting them on board the ship, in another country, prove that he had any intention to injure or violate the laws of his own country; all this might be done with an intention to send them to some other place, and not to come home. Or, having stock in England, he chose to purchase goods and lay them by in order to be ready for the first market at home, when his country should admit them. In all this, nobody will pretend there is any violation of our law. It is the way in which he has been brought up, and which he follows for the support of his family. Having a quantity of goods on hand, he waits patiently for the time—at length it arrives—the Orders in Council are revoked—he now leaps for joy—he looks into the non-importation law of the United States, and, by the second section, he finds it enacted:

“That in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall declare the fact by proclamation, and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification, in any suit or prosecution which may be instituted under the direction of the act to which this is a supplement. And the restrictions imposed, or which may be imposed, by virtue of the said act, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued.”

By this section of the law it is clear that the President was expected to revoke the law. The word “shall” is imperative on him. The law commands him to proclaim it, and Mr. Monroe’s letter of July 26th, 1811, to Mr. Foster fully proves the President intended so to do. It cannot be misunderstood, for he says:

If Great Britain will cease to violate the neutral rights of the United States, by revoking her Orders in Council, on which event alone the President has the power, I am instructed to inform you, that he will, without delay, exercise it by terminating the operation of this law.”

Sir, they were so revoked, and she did cease to violate our commerce, but the declaration of war prevented the President from exercising the power, had there been no other obstacles in the way. Sir, we are to take mankind as we find them. Every man is not a lawyer, nor every merchant a statesman. A man who is continually busy in his mercantile affairs, cannot be expected to understand all the minute circumstances which may occur; he understands the law just as it reads; he knows nothing of the war; and his reason tells him, after looking into the second section alluded to, and looking into Mr. Monroe’s letter, that, before he can possibly get home with his goods, the non-importation law will be off. Notwithstanding all this burden of proof in his favor, he goes to Mr. Russell, and advises with him; he tells him to ship his goods; that he has no doubt of the revocation of our law, by the President’s proclamation, before they can possibly get home. And one other proof is given in their coming with their goods, and delivering them to our officers, which, in my opinion, is as strong as any proof can be, in their favor; for no man in his right mind would set out from England to bring all he was worth with him, and deliver it here, if he expected the Government would take it from him. Is it possible that, with all this press of evidence in favor of a revocation, any man could disbelieve it? I think not. Has he not as strong ground for his belief as the man who killed his pursuer? It was his belief that made it excusable in him. Here, then, is the evidence on which the merchant founded his opinion. You cannot get clear of it. If, then, you believe he had just ground on which to form such an opinion, it is your duty, acting according to the true spirit of the law, to excuse him. Should the decision be otherwise, I shall be obliged, in spite of myself, to believe the merchants have not so many friends in this House as I thought they had. With me, it is impossible; I never can consent to condemn the innocent with the guilty; it is contrary both to the law of God and man.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Mr. Chairman, the subject now under discussion was first brought under the notice of Congress, by the following paragraph in the President's Message at the commencement of the present session: "A considerable number of American vessels, which were in England when the revocation of the Orders in Council took place, were laden with British manufactures, under an erroneous impression that the non-importation act would immediately cease to operate, and have arrived in the United States. It did not appear proper to exercise, on unforeseen cases of such magnitude, the ordinary power vested in the Treasury Department to mitigate forfeitures, without previously affording to Congress an opportunity of making on the subject such provision as they may think proper. In their decision they will doubtless equally consult what is due to equitable considerations and the public interest." So much of the Message as has been just read, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Their report constitutes the subject of our present deliberation, and of which the following is the material part:

"That on the view of the whole subject, the Committee are of opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to remit or mitigate the penalties and forfeitures incurred, should an interposition in either way be called for by the circumstances of the case; and, therefore, recommend that it be Resolved, That it is inexpedient to legislate upon the subject, and that the petitions with the accompanying documents be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury."

My object in presenting to the view of this Committee the President's Message and the report, is to call their attention to a total want of accordance between them. It is almost an abuse of language to call it a report. A report ought to comprehend the subject of reference, and be to it as a conclusion is to its premises. On reading the report only, the natural conclusions would be, that we were consulted as lawyers and not as statesmen; that the point of doubt in the Executive mind turned on the construction of our acts, and not on what justice, humanity, and sound policy demand. The report informs us, that the Secretary of the Treasury has power to remit or mitigate the penalties incurred, and from this fact it draws that negative proposition on which we are now deliberating. It is not a little curious to observe how formally and fully the Committee have decided on this power of the Treasury Department, doubted neither by the President or Secretary, nor indeed by any one; while they overlook those interesting considerations, towards which the Executive has directed the attention of Congress, "what is due to equitable considerations and to the public interest," in relation to "unforeseen cases of such magnitude." They are in truth cases of magnitude. Twenty millions of property await your decision, a sum equal to nearly half of the annual export of this country, and quite equal to the entire export in the best years of the whole country between Washington and New Orleans. It is difficult to realize magnitude when expressed in numbers only. To form a just conception we must aggregate the whole annual products of cotton, rice, and tobacco, with a large proportion of the breadstuffs of this country. I would be happy to know on what principle of policy or reason so large an amount is to be left to the decision of any individual. Is more wisdom, more virtue or public confidence, to be found in the Treasury Department, than in the assembled Representatives of the nation?

What, sir, constitutes a feature in this report still more extraordinary and objectionable, is the apparent understanding between the Committee and the Treasury Department. They coyly refuse to recommend any positive act of legislation, while they indirectly intimate what they wish and expect the Secretary of the Treasury to do; or, in other words, we are called on really and virtually to legislate, while we are informed that it is improper so to do. For, among the documents reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, as forming the basis of their opinion, is a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 23d of November, which contains the following paragraph: "Upon the whole, I continue in the opinion, submitted with great deference to the Committee, that one-half of the forfeitures which would otherwise fall to the collectors ought to be remitted; but that with respect to the one-half belonging to the United States, justice to the community requires, that when remitted, at least an equivalent may be secured to the public for the extra profit beyond that on common exportations, which arises from the continuation of the non importation act." Here, sir, the opinion of the Secretary is explicitly stated relative to these unforeseen cases of such magnitude, and the conclusion is irresistible, that the Committee in referring them to his decision must have approved of it.

The true question, then, before the Committee, is not to be found in that negative resolution reported by the Committee, that it is inexpedient to legislate on these cases; but in that part of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury which I have just read. Yes, we are now deliberating, in effect, whether it is proper to exact of the merchants their extra profit; and whether this ought to be done through the agency of the Treasury Department. I presume, the truth of this opinion will not be controverted; should it, however, ample proof will be found in almost every sentence of the report and the speeches of the gentlemen in support of it. They are literally compounded of laborious investigations to ascertain the extra profit of the merchants on their late importations.

Now, sir, without pretending to controvert the policy of taking the extra profit, I do assert, that it cannot be legally effected through the Secretary of the Treasury. It exceeds his powers. The non-importation law, under which the forfeitures accrued, refers to the act of 1797 to ascertain the powers of the Secretary in relation to cases of this kind. On reference to that act, his power will be found to be strictly a mitigating and remitting power, and has for its object the remedy of an imperfection incidental to all human laws. The best worded act must comprehend many cases within the letter, that are not within its spirit or intension. In every well regulated government, an equity exists somewhere to remedy this object; to mitigate the rigor of the law. The act of '97, for greater security of the revenue, vests this power in relation to our revenue laws in the head of the Treasury Department. The real object of those laws is to punish only the negligent or wilful violators; but, like other penal acts, they are couched in general terms, and comprehend those who by necessity or ignorance violate them. That the Treasury might be secured and the law at the same time administered in its spirit and intension only, and not its letter, this power was delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury. To establish the correctness of this exposition, I will read the act of '97:

Now, sir, though I admit, with the report "that the Secretary of the Treasury has power to mitigate or remit," I do most unequivocally deny, that he has legal power to effect what is proposed to be done by the Committee, to levy the extra profit. The two powers are most essentially different. The one is of a judicial and equitable character, and has for its object guilt or innocence; the other that of assessment or taxation, and has for its object not guilt or innocence, but profit. The latter is strictly a moneyed transaction; the former relates to the administration of the penal laws of the country. The one is administered in perfection, when due regard is had to all the circumstances as they constitute guilt or innocence, and the law applied accordingly; the other, when proper and correct estimate is made of the usual profits of trade and that on the late importation; and the difference only levied.

The power of the Secretary under the act of 1797 is not arbitrary, to be exercised or not, according to his pleasure; but he is bound to exercise it according to the rules of a sound discretion: if guilt appears he cannot withhold the law; if innocent he cannot apply it. The effects of the two powers strongly mark their contrariety. When circumstances of guilt or innocence only govern the Treasury in the exercise of this power, the consequence is love and reverence for the laws; but, if they are neglected, and the profit of the merchants only regarded, in the place of those sentiments will be disgust and hatred. You may, indeed, have a full Treasury, but you will find empty affections. More need not be said, I hope, to prove that the extra profit cannot be taken from the merchants under the power of the Treasury Department to mitigate or remit forfeitures. It is essentially a taxation; and not only is not delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury by the act of 1797, but cannot be by any act of ours. It is a power which the Constitution has sacredly deposited in Congress. It is incommunicable. I am aware, that the extra profit may be taken under the semblance of the mitigating power; that the forfeiture may be reduced to it. But this cannot change the nature of the transaction. The question will still be, is it a moneyed transaction, or a fair administration of the penal laws of the country? Is the object profit, or the execution of the laws? The circumstances of the case will readily decide its character. Profit and justice are not easily confounded. It is not an unusual thing for power to assume a guise; and even to appear to be the very opposite to what it really is. I impute no blame to the Committee of Ways and Means. They have overlooked the character of the power which they wish the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise. It is an act of inadvertence, but is not the less on that account to be resisted. Precedent is a dangerous thing; and it is not unusual for executive power, even unknown to those who exercise it, to make encroachments of this kind. What has been the end of all free governments, but open force, or the gradual undermining of the legislative by the executive power? The peculiar construction of ours by no means exempts us from this evil; but, on the contrary, were it not for the habits of the people, would naturally tend that way. The operation of this Government is an interesting problem. I wish to see the whole in full possession of its primitive power, but all of the parts confined to their respective spheres. These, sir, are my reasons for rejecting the report of the committee.

I know it will be said, that it is much easier to censure than to advise; to reject the report than to point out what ought to be done. I am ready to acknowledge it, and to confess, that I have felt much solicitude and difficulty on this subject. But the view which the committee has presented has constituted no part of my embarrassment. I am entirely adverse to taking any part of the extra profit, whether through the agency of the Treasury Department or this House.

If our merchants are innocent, they are welcome to their good fortune; if guilty, I scorn to participate in its profit. I will never consent to make our penal code the basis of our ways and means; or to establish a partnership between the Treasury and the violators of the non-importation law. The necessity of causing our restrictive system to be respected, while in existence, and the difficulty of applying its penalties to "cases of such magnitude," constitute my embarrassment. On the one hand if the law should be enforced, thousands will be involved in ruin; on the other, if an act of grace should be done, your restrictive system will be endangered. Had the conduct of the merchants been dictated by any open contempt of the laws, or it had been entirely free from blame, our course would have been plain. None would have hesitated in the one case to have let the vengeance of the law fall on the guilty; or in the other to extend its protection to the innocent. I am ready to acknowledge, that the importers were not sufficiently circumspect and guarded. The nature of the restrictive system, the posture of affairs, the recent decision of this House on a motion to repeal the non-importation act, ought to have put them on their guard. Candor also compels me to state, that I cannot admit any arguments on this question to prove the impolicy of the non-importation act; or the advantages to the community from the late importation. I can never admit as apology for the violation of the law, what was considered as an insufficient reason for its suspension, and cannot doubt that even the worst of laws ought to be respected.

But, sir, the difficulty on the other side appears to me more formidable. An indiscriminate forfeiture would, I fear, not be considered as punishment. It would be thought oppression. Punishment, by the infliction of a partial evil, proposes to avoid a greater; by making some the subjects of its pains, to make all of its terror. The culprits in this case are too numerous for example; particularly as the infraction of the law is of a doubtful character. This is by no means an unprecedented case; numbers have often brought impunity. It is so in the worst of crimes; even in treason, where in some instances a considerable portion of the community is involved. Some gentlemen who have felt this embarrassment, have proposed to distinguish for punishment the head and leaders of this infraction of the law. My friend from Kentucky (the Speaker) has made two favored classes; the purchasers of British goods before the 2d of February, 1811, and the shippers before the 1st of August last; that is, before the declaration of war was heard in England. The first class is favored from a supposed innocence of purchase; the other from innocence of shipments. It is not necessary to prove the error of this discrimination. If true, it does not extend as far as it ought to do. For, if innocence of purchase is a sufficient reason for exemption, how can we condemn the goods purchased before the 1st of August? For if shipments might be made before that period, surely purchase might; and if the last, then, according to the distinction in favor of purchasers before the 2d of February, they also ought to be exempted from the forfeitures. The cases then are too uniform for discrimination; and nothing remains, but to condemn or acquit the whole. I feel myself compelled to yield to the magnitude of the case. I cannot find it in me to reduce thousands to beggary by a single stroke; nor do I suppose there is one in this House in favor of so stern a policy. I am ready to acknowledge, that an act of grace will weaken the non-importation law; but that is a less evil than the alienation of the whole mercantile class. It is left to us to regret, that the wise foresight of my two honorable friends and colleagues was not adopted the last session. It was then proposed to suspend the law for the introduction of this very property; but it was borne down by the clamor of the day. Had that been done, we would not have been reduced to the present state. Our laws would have been saved and our merchants contented.

A subject, not necessarily involved in that under discussion, has been introduced by those who have preceded me in the debate. In imitation of the example, I will be excused, I hope, in offering my sentiments on the restrictive system. It is known that I have not been a friend to that system to the extent to which it has been carried. My objection, however, is neither against the inequality, or the greatness of its pressure. It is the duty of every section to bear whatever the general interest may demand; and I, sir, am proud in representing a people pre-eminent in the exercise of this virtue. Carolina makes no complaint about the difficulties of the times. If she feels embarrassments, she turns her indignation not against her own Government, but against the common enemy. She make no comparative estimate of her sufferings with the other States. She would be even proud to be pre-eminent in suffering, if by that the general good could be promoted, and this day she presents the magnanimity of gaining union and energy by the pressure; and so far from growing tired of the restrictive system, or war, as intimated by the gentleman from Kentucky, that she would willingly bear a superadded embargo, if the public interest should demand it. But, sir, my objections are of a general and national character. Your character, your Government, and country, forbid a resort to this system for a redress of wrongs. It requires a sternness of execution approaching despotism. It first creates a vast premium for its violation; and then has to combat with the speculation, the cupidity, and capital, of the whole mercantile class. To render its execution perfect, you must not only repress the fraud, but the speculations of the merchants; particularly that which is founded on the course of political events. The subject before us is in point; and you will from the same cause be involved in this very dilemma annually, even more frequently, should the Treasury participate in the profit. To render your system perfect, you must imitate its successful execution in another country. Bonaparte is the only man who has a perfect knowledge of its genius. Burning and confiscation are the only effectual securities. A partial execution involves the most pernicious consequences. The conclusion is irresistible. The system does not suit you. You are too enterprising—too free—and your coast too extended, with too many indentations of rivers, bays, and harbors. The effects of a few years' operation will change your mercantile character. In such a state of things the honest merchant must retire. He cannot live. His place will not be unoccupied. The desperate adventurer and the smuggler will succeed. Unaided by the virtue of the citizens, no law, however severe its sanction, will be able to stem the torrent. There is indeed one species of restrictions, which, in a British war, ought never to be neglected. Whatever pressure can be produced on her manufacturing and commercial interest through heavy duties ought to be effected. The reason is obvious—it is both restriction and revenue. So much of the capital of this country is turned towards foreign commerce, that you cannot safely neglect this source of revenue. Nor is its restrictive character inconsiderable. The assertion may seem strange; but I believe it to be the highest practical and continued pressure that can be produced. To say nothing of the perpetual violation of an entire prohibition by smuggling, it is subject to occasional relaxations, by which the country becomes inundated with British goods. At the end of the last session, I recommended high duties as a substitute for the non-importation act. Under that system, the quantity of goods imported would not have been greater than it now is; but your Treasury would have been much better replenished. Nor should we have had the present contest about extra profits. It would have passed into the Treasury under the shape of duties. High duties have no pernicious effects; and are consistent with the genius of the people and the institutions of the country. It is thus we would combine in the greatest degree the active resources of the country with pressure on the manufactures of the enemy. Your Army and Navy would feel the animating effect. The war would not sicken the patriot's hope, and defeat some of its most valuable anticipated consequences. You would have the means of filling the ranks of the regulars; and would no longer rely on the hazardous aid of volunteers and militia. Victory, peace, and national honor, I was going to say glory, but experience has taught me how that word is received in this House, would be the welcomed result of a vigorous war. But, sir, if we must have one or the other, either all war or all restriction, I would prefer the former. Suppose either would bring the enemy to our terms; even in their victory they are unequal. By restriction you have nothing but the success; but the assertion of our national rights by arms creates those qualities which amply compensate for the privation and expense incidental to that state. Admit that the Tripolitans could have been coerced to terms by non-importation acts, and that we had resorted to restriction rather than arms; could we have this day boasted of our naval victories? The Mediterranean war was the school of our naval virtue. It has elevated the hopes of our country. We may now look forward to the day with confidence, when we shall be no longer insulted and injured on the high road of nations with impunity. Besides, the non-importation, as a redress of wrongs, is radically defective. You may meet commercial restrictions with commercial restrictions; but you cannot safely confront premeditated insult and injury with commercial restrictions alone. I utter not this from the fervor of my feelings, but it is the deliberate result of my best judgment. It sinks the nation in its own estimation; it counts for nothing what is ultimately connected with our best hopes—the union of these States. Our Union cannot safely stand on the cold calculation of interest alone. It is too weak to withstand political convulsions. We cannot without hazard neglect that which makes man live to be a member of an extensive community—the love of greatness—the consciousness of strength. So long as an American is a proud name, we are safe; but that day we are ashamed of it, the Union is more than half destroyed.

The Committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again. And the House adjourned.

BONDS OF THE MERCHANTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of merchants' bonds.

Mr. BIGG said he was sensible of the unfavorable circumstances, both in relation to himself personally and to the Committee, under which he should endeavor to present his views of the subject before them. His strength, enfeebled as it was, would not enable him to discuss the question in the manner, and to the extent he desired; nor, considering the time already occupied in debate, could he be unmindful of the regard which was due to the patience of that body. But, being a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and concurring in their report, it became his duty to aid in its defence to the extent of his ability. Yes, I did concur in this report; a report which has been denounced as unprecedented and alarming; as vesting legislative powers in the Secretary of the Treasury over forty millions of property; as degrading to the parties whose interests are concerned; and, as calculated to alienate the affections of one third of the people of this country. Sir, I admire the eloquence with which the report has been assailed; but neither the argument, nor the temper in which they have been urged, are calculated to convince or to conciliate. While gentlemen demand the rejection of the report, upon the ground of conciliation more than for any other reason, they present a spectacle too often witnessed—precept and example at war with each other. The interest of your citizens residing on the seacoast are arrayed against those of the people of the interior, and the Representatives of the nation are charged with having sacrificed the one for the benefit of the other. We are told of the imposition of double duties during the last session of Congress, without, at the same time, resorting to internal taxes; and it is said, that as the people on the seaboard pay more than their proportion, the operation of this species of taxation is unequal and unjust. Admitting that, in proportion to population, more of foreign articles are consumed in your seaport towns and their vicinities, and of course a greater proportionate amount of the duties paid than in the interior, yet when we inquire for whose immediate benefit the revenue thus collected is expended, the subject assumes a different aspect. For whose immediate benefit, let me ask, are the millions annually expended on fortifications, ships, &c.? Is it for the defence of the people of the interior? No, sir; and yet they never have complained. I am unwilling to pursue these unpleasant distinctions, but I assert, as a fact which cannot be controverted, that if the relative proportions of duties paid by the different districts of the country be fairly estimated and compared with the objects of the public expenditures, your citizens on the seaboard would be debtors to a very large amount. But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts,

Merchants' Bonds.

(Mr. RICHARDSON,) the National Legislature has been pouring out vials of wrath upon the merchants, while the planter and the farmer have been prosperous and happy. The interest of the merchant alone, he contends, has been disregarded and abandoned. Does the gentleman recollect, that we are at war, and for what we are at war? Are the interests of the merchants not concerned in the contest we are prosecuting? For what object, and for whose immediate benefit, I ask, do the blood and treasure of the nation at this moment flow? For the maintenance of our national rights on the ocean; for the immediate benefit of the merchant. With such evidence before them, the charge of hostility to commerce will not be believed by the American people.

I will now proceed, Mr. Chairman, to examine the question which is directly before the Committee. I shall endeavor to show that the report upon your table involves no new principle; vests no new powers in the Secretary of the Treasury; affords no reasonable ground of complaint to the parties whose interests are concerned; and that it proposes the proper and only practicable mode of attaining the purposes of justice.

To make out this case, I must be permitted to recapitulate the circumstances connected with it. For years past, the indisputable rights of the nation have been habitually violated by the belligerents of Europe. As a means of security and retaliation, the restrictive system was adopted, and has been pursued under different modifications. The non-importation act is now in operation. The penalty annexed to the violation of its provisions, is a forfeiture of the vessel and cargo, and treble their value. The President was authorized to discontinue the act whenever Great Britain should revoke or so modify her edicts, as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States. Such was the extent of distress produced by this exclusion of British merchandise from the American market, that on the 23d of June last, the Orders in Council were so modified as that they would have ceased to violate the neutral commerce of this country. But war having been previously declared against Great Britain, and, consequently, being no longer a neutral nation, the authority formerly vested in the Executive to put an end to the restrictive system had ceased to exist. Immediately after the modification of the Orders in Council, however, merchandise to a very large amount was shipped from Great Britain, and has arrived within the ports of the United States. Such merchandise was seized and labelled by the collectors in conformity to law, but has been restored to the claimants by the courts, on their giving bonds for its appraised value. In this situation, the importers ask of Congress a total remission of the penalties and forfeitures they have incurred. Those whose goods left England before the declaration of war was known there, urge, as an equitable consideration in their favor, the absence of intention to violate the law. Those who shipped afterwards rely solely on the mercy of Congress. I readily admit, sir, that there are extenuating circumstances, which may be plead in behalf of the first class; but the plea of no intention to violate the law cannot be sustained, except upon the ground of ignorance of the law, which is at all times inadmissible, and which especially cannot be presumed in the present case. The statute provided, that whenever Great Britain should so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President should declare the fact by proclamation, and the non-importation act should cease and be discontinued, (not from the time of the modification or revocation of the British edicts,) but "from the date of such proclamation." The law also provides that the putting merchandise on board any vessel in a British port, with intent to import the same, shall subject the party to all its penalties. It is obvious, therefore, that as the merchandise lately imported was shipped from a British port before intelligence could reach this country of the modification of the Orders in Council, and consequently before the President could issue his proclamation, no rational expectation could be entertained that the importations would be lawful.

Such an expectation would have had for its foundation an impossibility. Yet, there was reasonable ground to expect that the modification of the Orders in Council would produce a corresponding departure from our restrictive system, and that, having attained its object, the Government would readily remit all forfeitures and penalties that might be incurred. On this part of the subject, however, I shall speak hereafter. The law which has been thus violated by the petitioners, gives discretionary power to the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or mitigate all penalties and forfeitures which should be incurred under it, if unaccompanied with fraud or wilful negligence. The same power was vested in the Treasury Department, under the Administration of General WASHINGTON, in relation to all violations of the revenue laws, and it has been continued ever since. In consequence, however, of the magnitude of the present case, the Secretary of the Treasury thought proper to suspend the exercise of his authority, until an opportunity should be afforded to Congress of giving the subject whatever direction they pleased. Your Committee of Ways and Means, after the most mature deliberation, have submitted, as their report, that, "on a view of the whole subject, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to remit or mitigate the penalties and forfeitures incurred, should an interposition in either way be called for by the circumstances of the case; and that it is inexpedient to legislate upon the subject." This course of proceeding, so far from being unprecedented or novel, is sanctioned by the uniform practice under every Administration. Soon after the commencement of this Government, it was found indispensable to vest, somewhere, the power to remit or mitigate forfeitures and penalties incurred under the revenue laws, according to the extenuating circumstances of the case; and that power has been vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. From the nature of his duties, he necessarily becomes acquainted with the arts employed to elude the laws, whose execution he superintends; he is, therefore, the better qualified to detect the motives which may have led to a violation of those laws, and, consequently, to determine correctly in what cases relief ought to be extended. Another advantage is attained which is highly important in all cases affecting private rights—uniformity of decision. Under this system, your laws have hitherto been executed without objections or complaint. And are terms to be so perverted now, that the power to remit or mitigate a penalty legally incurred, is to be construed into an odious species of legislative power over the property of your citizens? Sir, it possesses no more the character of a legislative power than does the pardoning power vested in the Executives of the respective States, nor in any point of view is it more objectionable. In both instances, the power is vested in an individual, and surely the principle cannot be varied by the title of the officer. Gentlemen appear to have forgotten the acknowledged fact, that the petitioners are violators of law, and have incurred its penalties; and they blend the discretionary authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or mitigate those penalties, with the power to inflict punishment, which, in its nature and object, is totally distinct. It is, however, contended, that, notwithstanding the power of remission and mitigation has been vested in the Treasury Department under all administrations, yet the law giving this general authority never contemplated cases like the present. Permit me to remark, that the fallacy of this suggestion is proved by the fact, that a provision of the very statute which the petitioners have violated, does, in express terms, delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury the same remitting power over fines, forfeitures, and penalties, incurred under it, with which he is clothed by a permanent law in relation to violations of the revenue laws generally. It is true, as has been said, that the President has referred this case to Congress; but what does he say? "A considerable number of American vessels, which were in England when the revocation of the Orders in Council took place, were laden with British manufactures under an erroneous impression that the non-importation act would immediately cease to operate, and have arrived in the United States. It did not appear proper to exercise on unforeseen cases of such magnitude the ordinary powers vested in the Treasury Department to mitigate forfeitures, without previously affording to Congress an opportunity of making on the subject such provision as they may think proper." Here the power of the Secretary of the Treasury over the case is admitted, and it is distinguished from other cases, not by a difference of principle, but by its unforeseen magnitude alone.

No opinion is expressed, or fairly deducible, that we ought to legislate upon the subject. The President has only said that, for the reason assigned, he deemed it respectful to the Representatives of the nation to suspend the exercise of the authority vested in the Treasury Department. No obligation is imposed on this body; other than to determine whether or not it be expedient to adopt any new provisions for the case; and, in deciding that question, we are left to the dictates of our own judgments. The unforeseen magnitude of the case may have justified the course pursued by the President, and yet furnish no substantial argument against the report of the committee. Because the Executive has thought proper to manifest his respect for the will of the Legislature, it does not follow, therefore, that the Secretary of the Treasury should be divested of the power he has so long possessed, and which has been exercised to the satisfaction of all parties. We are not called upon to decide whether the President ought to have referred the subject to Congress, nor should the fact of his having done so influence our decision. He determined what was his duty, and we are the judges of ours. Without, therefore, questioning the propriety of his conduct, the committee have submitted the opinion, that the present case should take the course which has been uniformly given to all others of a like nature. We consider the rights of an individual as sacred as the rights of thousands; the property of the one entitled to as much security as the property of the many. We say the magnitude of the case does not vary the principle—uniformity of decision is essential to the purposes of justice. If, therefore, it be no invasion of the principles of civil liberty, that the power vested in the Treasury Department is exercised in relation to violations of law committed by one, the number cannot make it otherwise. And, allow me to add that, if any further evidence of the correctness of the report could have been desired, it has been fully supplied by the discussion in which we are engaged. Gentlemen urge the necessity of taking this case from the established tribunal; and yet, if they shall succeed, scarcely any two agree how it should be decided. It is obvious, therefore, that a majority cannot be had in favor of any decision which conforms to their ideas of justice individually, or which is not, according to their respective views of the subject, necessarily compounded of right and wrong. I am, indeed, astonished that this debate alone has not produced the conviction that a legislative body is not calculated for the investigation and determination of cases like the present. If, however, we are to investigate in this way on the established usages of the Government, it is apparent that our session must be perpetual; and that the enforcement of the laws of the country, so far from being directed by any uniform rule, will depend on the party feelings and party circumstances of the day. From the extraordinary diversity of sentiment exhibited on the present occasion, we may infer what would have been the situation of Congress, had they undertaken to decide the numerous cases of a similar nature heretofore determined by the Treasury Department. And yet those cases have been decided, unquestionably, by some uniform rule, and, certainly, without murmur or complaint. But, sir, it is contended by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN,) that the reference proposed by the report is to vest the Secretary of the Treasury with unconstitutional legislative power to levy a tax. If I understood the course of his argument, it was this—that, on application by a party who has incurred fines, penalties, or forfeitures, to the Secretary of the Treasury, he is authorized to inquire only into the fact whether there be wilful negligence or fraud, and to decide accordingly; that he is to look at the character of the violation of the law, and not at its consequences upon the community. The gentleman infers from the points particularly investigated by the Committee of Ways and Means, and the letter of Mr. Gallatin to that committee, that the question of fraud or wilful negligence constitutes no part of the inquiry; that the question appears to be, what extra profits have accrued to the petitioners in consequence of the existence of the law they have violated; that it is in the nature of the assessment of a tax, and, therefore, belongs exclusively to the Legislature. I must be permitted, Mr. Chairman, to deny the premises and the conclusions of the gentleman from South Carolina, and I shall be sustained by the statute delegating the power of remission to the Treasury Department. After directing the mode in which cases may be brought before that tribunal, it provides: “who (referring to the Secretary of the Treasury) shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit such fine, forfeiture, or penalty, or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same.” Now, sir, what is the plain, obvious construction of this provision? The Secretary of the Treasury is vested with a conditional pardoning power. He is authorized to exercise in the first place the judicial function of determining from the facts and circumstances whether there has been wilful negligence or any intention of fraud; and upon the decision of that question depends his subsequent authority. If he believes there has been wilful negligence or fraud, he has no power under the law to remit or mitigate; and it is in the absence of these only he is permitted to extend relief. The expression of wilful negligence or fraud, which is so construed as to constitute the delegation of power, is in fact a limitation upon the power which would have been given, had that expression been omitted. To prove this position, I will recur to the law. “Who (referring to the Secretary of the Treasury) shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit such fine, forfeiture, or penalty, or remove such disability or any part thereof.” Here, there is unquestionably the delegation of an unqualified, unlimited power of mitigation or remission; and the following concluding part of the sentence imposes a restriction upon it: “If in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same.” I say, therefore, that the construction which has been given to the law is perfectly inconsistent with its provisions; that, so far from the fact of wilful negligence or fraud, or the character of the offence, constituting the only question for the consideration of the Secretary of the Treasury in the exercise of his pardoning power—that power does not commence until after the ascertainment of that fact. It being ascertained that the party who has incurred a penalty is not guilty of wilful negligence or fraud, then the condition of the discretionary authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury is fulfilled, and he “shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit,” &c. Then it is he has the “power” of pardon, but is still the judge whether it shall be exercised at all, and to what extent. If it were intended that in the absence of wilful negligence and fraud he should have no discretion, the words of the law would have been imperative. Instead of giving “the power,” they would have directed under such circumstances a remission of all fines, forfeitures, and penalties incurred. So very different, however, is the provision of the law, that the Secretary of the Treasury is not only the judge whether he will interpose his merciful authority at all; but whether it shall be exercised in the form of total remission or of mitigation. This latter discretion is inconsistent with the idea, that in the absence of wilful negligence or fraud he is bound to remit. In determining, therefore, on the extent of relief which shall be afforded, it is not only his right, but his bounden duty, to examine the circumstances of the case in all these relations.

Sir, neither the inquiries of a committee nor the letter of Mr. Gallatin can affect the provisions of your statute. The Secretary has, or he has not, a discretionary power under the statute, and that must be decided by the provisions of the statute alone. If I have shown that the pardoning power is vested in the Treasury Department in cases only where the parties have not been guilty of wilful negligence or fraud, and that it is a discretionary power, it follows conclusively that the character of the offence is not the only subject for consideration; but that the benefit the offender has derived from his offence, and its consequences upon the community, are to be regarded. The object of punishment is the prevention of crimes; and it is essential to that object that the pardoning power should not be so exercised as to make the violation of a law profitable to the offender. To avoid this, it necessarily becomes the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the exercise of his mitigating power, to have reference to the profits which the party has gained from his disobedience. The distinction which has been drawn between this case and others of a like nature, by the gentleman from South Carolina, in consequence of the course of the proceedings of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of the letter from Mr. Gallatin, is fairly resolvable into this: that the Secretary of the Treasury may, or may not, remit or mitigate as he shall think proper, provided his decision be influenced by a particular train of reasoning; that the legality or rather constitutionality of the act of remitting or refusing to remit depends on the precise course of reasoning which the Secretary's mind happens to employ; that, because the present petitioners have made enormous profits, amounting to a heavy tax on the people, in consequence of the existence of the law which they have violated, therefore the Secretary is bound to remit the penalties they have incurred.

Sir, the distinction of the gentleman is in my apprehension utterly without foundation. The question is, have these violations of law been the result of wilful negligence or fraud; if they have not (and it is on this plea that the cause of the petitioners is defended) then their case is fairly before the Treasury Department; is precisely such a case as is contemplated by the statute to which I have referred, and is distinguished in no way (except by the number of individuals concerned) from hundreds of cases which have been decided by that tribunal. On this part of the subject, Mr. Chairman, I must be permitted to go further. I contend, not only that the Secretary of the Treasury has full powers over this case; but that Congress have not, and therefore ought not to legislate upon it. The revenue laws and the act of non-importation vest one-half of the fines, forfeitures, and penalties, incurred under them, in the persons who shall give information of their infraction, and in certain officers. That half, I shall endeavor to show, is beyond the legitimate control of the National Legislature. In England the King has the general power of pardoning, and yet he cannot remit that part of any fine, forfeiture, or penalty, which is to accrue to informers. It is a principle of the common law, that the party giving information acquires a private property in the reward offered by penal statutes, and it is this principle alone which limits the pardoning power of the King in relation to the rights of informers. The doctrine is, that "he cannot pardon an offence against a popular or penal statute after information brought, for thereby the informer has acquired a private property in his part or penalty." Shall it be said that private rights are less protected in this country than in England? The correctness of the doctrine in its fullest extent has been admitted by the Speaker and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHEVES,) but they have urged distinguishing circumstances which, in their apprehension, render it inapplicable to the present case. The gentleman from South Carolina contends that it is distinguished from the cases in which the Crown cannot remit the informer's part, by the circumstances, that the penalties in this case are to be recovered for the United States in the names of their officers, and that it is only in the event of absolute recovery they acquire any property. If the gentleman will refer to the statute he will find prosecutions are not confined to the officers of Government, but that they may be instituted at the instance of informers. And if they were so confined, I know of no principle of law or reason which, under such circumstances, would make a distinction between the rights of an officer and an informer. The form of prosecution prescribed by the statute cannot affect the question. The fact that the right of property in the proportion of fines, penalties, or forfeitures, accruing to informers or collectors, is not perfected until after absolute recovery, so far from being a distinguishing circumstance, is necessarily the case under all penal statutes, whether in England or in this country. But it does not follow that because the right of property is not perfect until the prosecution is concluded, no right accrues from its commencement. Nor will it be contended that a citizen can be arbitrarily divested of a qualified right with more propriety than of a perfect right. But, says the gentleman, if the power of Congress is not complete, why delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury the disposition of that half of the penalties accruing to the United States. Sir, we do not propose to delegate any authority to the Secretary of the Treasury; we barely say it is inexpedient to take from him that which he already possesses.

In our turn, we ask, why take the case from the established tribunal which alone has competent and ample jurisdiction; when your authority is thus limited? It is said by the honorable Speaker that, in England, the Crown cannot remit the informer's part of a penalty, because the power of remission is not reserved in the law denouncing the penalty, but that, in our laws, the power is reserved. This is an admission that the persons claiming one-half of a penalty or forfeiture do acquire a private property from the commencement of prosecution, and that there is no power to divest them of it, except what is reserved by our laws. The question, therefore, which we have to examine is brought within very narrow limits—What power is reserved by our laws? It is found in the provision which I have already had occasion to notice in the course of my remarks. It is the provision which delegates to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to remit, in whole, or in part, all fines, forfeitures, and penalties, "if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same." The statute, of which this provision is a part, previously directs the mode by which cases shall be brought before the Treasury Department, and guaranties to the parties in whom one-half of such penalties is vested, the right of being heard. An opportunity is afforded them of showing "that there has been wilful negligence or fraud;" and if they establish that fact, their right to the proportion allowed them by law is consummated. There being no power of remission reserved in cases where, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, there has been fraud or wilful negligence, it results, according to the admission of gentlemen, that, in such cases, to remit would be to invade the sanctity of private rights. The position I take is this: that so soon as an informer gives information of the violation of a penal statute, he acquires an inchoate right to his proportion of the fine, forfeiture, or penalty incurred, subject only to the qualified controlling authority vested in the Treasury Department; he commences his claim under the then existing laws of the land and protected by their provisions; and no new conditions impairing that claim can be imposed on the prosecution of his right, without being ex post facto in their nature and operation. His right to the legal proportion of the penalties incurred by the petitioners is perfect against all persons or authorities whatsoever, except the conditional power of the Secretary of the Treasury. But, says the honorable Speaker, the Secretary of the Treasury is a mere Executive officer, and whatever Congress can do by him they may do themselves. It is true that Congress may abolish the Treasury Department, or may direct the duties to be performed by whomsoever and in any manner they may please, provided they legislate prospectively; but I deny the correctness of the position, as intended to be understood. Whether he be an Executive officer is not material, inasmuch as the character of the officer neither increases nor diminishes the controlling power of Congress. In relation, however, to the subject now before us, he presents himself in the twofold character of Judicial and Executive. He is authorized to judge whether there has been wilful negligence or fraud, and, in their absence, to exercise the power of pardon. He derives his appointment from the same source whence the judges receive theirs, and the control of Congress over each is the same. What would be said of a proposition submitted to this House for taking from the courts of law any depending cause embracing the case of individuals, for the purpose of deciding it ourselves? And I humbly conceive there is no substantial distinction between such a case and the present, whether you regard the power of Congress or the private rights of the citizen. If, under the idea of the power to do ourselves what we can do by others, retrospective laws can be enacted, disregarding rights already accrued; then, indeed, is private property subject to the whim and caprice of every succeeding Congress. Can it be said that it is a mere change of remedy and not of right, to take this case from the Treasury Department, when, in your investigation, or rather decision without investigation, the parties who have acquired a property in the matter to be decided, have not been heard? No, sir, it is to deprive them of all remedy, and consequently to destroy their right. So far as we are furnished with precedents in the legislation of this country, they confirm the view of this subject I have endeavored to present. On an examination of our statute book, it will be found that, in every act which has been passed, where the only object of legislation was the remission of fines and penalties, the rights of informers are expressly recognised. It is true, as was stated by the Speaker, that certain acts have passed repealing penal statutes generally, and which contained a clause remitting all penalties incurred under them, without expressly reserving whatever rights might have accrued to informers. Those statutes, however, had been of short duration, and it is not known that any violations had taken place, without which no rights could have accrued. But, while it must be admitted that the examples, to which I have referred, are indicative of the regard paid to private rights by our predecessors, the honorable Speaker cannot seriously urge his cases as precedents upon the subject. He is too well acquainted with the circumstances which are essential to give authority to precedents, and too well convinced that they do not exist in the examples to which he has referred, to make it necessary for me to draw the proper distinctions.

But, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have inferred, from circumstances, what will be the decision of this case, if left to the ordinary tribunal; and, if I am not mistaken, their real objection applies to the nature of that decision, rather than to the reference proposed by the Committee. If it were understood that the Secretary of the Treasury would remit unconditionally the penalties and forfeitures that have been incurred, I apprehend, the report would have been considered perfectly proper by some of those, at least, who are now most opposed to it. Is this a sufficient reason for wresting the case from the established tribunal, and especially when scarcely any two agree precisely how it should be decided? As well might any party, having a cause depending before a court, claim the right to be tried by some other tribunal, because, he apprehends, the honest opinion of the judge is not so favorable to his views as he could desire. If gentlemen have anticipated correctly what will be the decision of the Treasury Department, I confess it is more favorable to the petitioners than would be my decision, if I should be called upon to decide. But that being the tribunal to which the case properly belongs, and it being competent, in every way, to do justice to the parties concerned, I will not consent to change it.

The alarm which has been excited by the following paragraph, contained in the letter of Mr. Gallatin to the Committee of Ways and Means, I consider totally groundless. In speaking of the forfeitures and penalties incurred by the petitioners, he remarks that:

"With respect to the one-half belonging to the United States, justice to the community requires that, when remitted, at least an equivalent may be secured to the public for the extra profit beyond that on common importations which arises from the continuance of the non-importation act."

The word "equivalent" has been construed to imply a loan of money to the Government, and it is odious and abominable. Whether the interpretation be correct, it is not for me to determine; but, supposing it to be so, it does not follow that there exists any foundation for the degrading imputations which have been so lavishly bestowed. The annexation of fines, forfeitures, and penalties, to the violation of law, is authorized by the fundamental principles of society, and sanctioned by the practice of all Governments; it is intended to prevent the commission of offences. The reservation of a power to remit or mitigate, according to extenuating circumstances, has also been found expedient. In the present case, the parties have incurred the penalties of a law not of an ordinary character; of a law which appeals to the patriotism of the country, which was enacted with the sole object of affecting the interest of the enemy, and thereby enforcing due respect for the rights of the nation. The petitioners plead extenuating circumstances; but, the fact is incontrovertible that, by their violation of your law, the distress it was inflicting on the enemy has been alleviated, and they enriched to an unexampled extent. The question is, shall they be relieved from the penalties and forfeitures they have incurred, either in whole or in part? It is admitted by all, that there is nothing dishonorable or unjust in the idea of mitigation; or, in other words, of remitting only a part of the legal punishment; and, indeed, the statute giving the pardoning power to the Secretary of the Treasury, provides for cases in which justice may require that a part of a penalty should be remitted, but not the whole; he has the discretion of remitting, or mitigating, or removing disabilities, in whole or in part. To mitigate a penalty legally incurred; to require the payment of a sum less than what is legally due, is a relaxation of strict right, which may be, and often is, called for by extenuating circumstances, which would render the enforcement of the whole penalty oppressive. Having determined what part in justice and equity you ought to exact, the changing of the sum which it has been determined right to demand, for the loan of a larger sum, (leaving it optional to the party to pay the one or lend the other,) is only the continuation of the same principle. It is money in one shape for money in another shape. It is not the commutation of a forfeited life for money; it is not the substitution of a punishment of a different nature; it is only one of the modifications of which the same punishment is susceptible. The whole of the argument on either side rests on the justice or injustice of exacting any portion of the penalties and forfeitures incurred. Admit that we have a right in equity to the whole or a part, and the commutation of the sum thus equitably due for the loan of a larger sum, (at the option of the party,) is nothing more nor less than an extension of the mitigating principle; it is a further relaxation and not an act of oppression. Where, then, I ask, is the foundation for the abominable character which has been attributed to the supposed idea of the Secretary of the Treasury? Is there any analogy between such a course of proceeding and the oppressions of the avaricious Henry VII, and his vile instruments, Empson and Dudley? Were the compositions, during his reign, not the result of illegal and oppressive prosecutions? Is the possession of money the only offence of which the present petitioners are guilty? Have they violated no law constitutionally passed, and incurred no penalties? Have they been prosecuted without the sanction of statute, and for the sole purpose of exacting compositions? The intelligent mind of the gentleman from South Carolina

(Mr. CHEVES) cannot fail to perceive the distinction; and I rely on his candor for a correction of the unnatural association he has presented to the House.

Sir, it has appeared to me, that, in the exercise of conscientious scruples, gentlemen have forgotten the rights of all except the violators of your law. The spirit of the Constitution has been invoked in their behalf, and yet, in granting them a total remission of the penalties and forfeitures they have incurred, no Constitutional difficulties are felt in relation to the rights of the community. The very gentlemen who denied the authority of Congress, on a former occasion, to grant a bank charter, on the ground of its being a monopoly, and of monopolies not being sanctioned by the Constitution, will, by the unqualified remission they propose, constitute the petitioners monopolists to all intents and purposes. A law is in operation forbidding the importation of British merchandise; a few merchants import such prohibited merchandise, and, in consequence of the exclusion of competition by the law, demand what prices they please, and obtain what they demand. Now, if Congress shall sanction their act, by giving them the enjoyment of their gains, they will have granted a monopoly in every sense of the term. Suppose a proposition had been made at the last session of Congress, to give the petitioners the exclusive right, for a limited time, to import British goods, is there a man who would not have said it is unconstitutional? If it would have been unconstitutional, then, to grant a monopoly, it must be equally so to sanction it now. There can be no rational distinction between granting it beforehand, and sanctioning it after the fact. The Constitution expressly forbids any regulation of commerce, which shall give a preference to the ports of one State over those of another, and the spirit of that instrument equally forbids any preference to one class of merchants over another. Should the late importations be legalized, you do sanction a preference to the ports of one State over those of another, in the precise proportion that the importations to such ports have been greater relatively to other ports than they would have been, had your prohibitory statute not been in force. Unquestionably you will have secured to a few individuals the benefits of a trade from which the rest of the nation is excluded, and by which exclusion those benefits are greatly enhanced.

Sir, there is another view of this question, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee. The total remission, which has been so eloquently urged, involves a new principle, unheard of in the history of any country; a principle hostile to the primary objects of Government, and subversive of the best interests of society. It is not to pardon the offenders only, but to give them a premium for their disobedience; to place them in a better situation than they would have been, had they, like other citizens, obeyed the law. Although a difference of opinion exists as to the extent, yet it is admitted by the petitioners themselves that their profits have been enhanced in consequence of the existence of the law they have violated. To allow them these profits is an alarming innovation on the ordinary principles of pardon; it is to make it the interest of every man to disobey the laws of his country. You cannot pursue this course without abandoning the rights of the community, and endangering the majesty of the laws. Either repeal the non-importation act, or do not permit a few individuals to disobey its express provisions with impunity, and then convert that disobedience and the continuance of the prohibitory statute into a monopoly in their favor.

It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to examine the evidence which has been presented by the Committee of Ways and Means. That task has been performed, and ably performed, by the two members of the committee (Messrs. JOHNSON and ROBERTS) who have preceded me. I consider the introduction of any testimony wholly unnecessary; but, if it be necessary, that which has been collected is totally insufficient, and ought to have no weight in support of the pretensions of the petitioners. To determine the proposition of the committee for referring the case to the decision of the ordinary tribunal, I cannot perceive the possible necessity of evidence of any sort, but if it be material I protest against that which is now before you. I assert, without the fear of contradiction, that such testimony never was admitted in a case of private right before any tribunal whatsoever. In what does it consist? The statements of the petitioners and of parties interested, many of whom were not even sworn. I personally attach as much credit to those statements as I would to the statements of respectable men generally under similar circumstances. But no one of any experience can be ignorant of the imperfections of human nature, and of the powerful influence of interest over the minds of the best of men. The analogy which has been drawn by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) from the testimony lately taken before a committee of the House of Commons in England, on the subject of the Orders in Council, cannot be sustained. What was the nature of that case, and of the evidence taken? The Orders in Council had been adopted as a measure of great national concernment and it became a question whether, as a measure of policy, its effects were beneficial or injurious to the nation. A committee was appointed to investigate the subject, and in the performance of their duty they took the testimony under oath of persons residing in different parts of the Kingdom, and particularly of that class whose interests had been said to be most affected, and who consequently could afford the most accurate information. What is the case of the petitioners? They are not called upon to give information of the operation of any national measure on the respective portions of country in which they reside. Far different is the case in which their testimony has been taken; it is a case on the decision of which their immediate interest depends; it is a question of private right—of private property.

The distinction is so clear, so irresistible, that I am persuaded further illustration would be superfluous. I might here, Mr. Chairman, close my defence of the report of the committee; but as other gentlemen have discussed the question whether the petitioners are entitled to relief, and the extent of such relief, I may be permitted to express my opinion also. I have before admitted that the shipment of merchandise from England, after the repeal of the Orders in Council, and before a knowledge of the war, was, under all the circumstances, an act of rational speculation; that, although the parties cannot plead the absence of intention to violate the law, and are not guiltless, yet that they may plead probable ground for the impression that the policy of the law was attained, and that they would be released from its penalties. It should be remarked, however, that this act of speculation was not without known risk, because the proceedings of the last session of Congress, from its commencement, were of such a character as at least to render war not an improbable event. And the refusal at that time to permit the introduction of American funds said to be in England, was a clear manifestation that in such an event the non-importation act would be continued. The intervention of war, and the continuance of that act, have disappointed the expectations of the petitioners, and at the same time enhanced the value of the articles they have imported; the distress of the enemy has been alleviated, and the war probably prolonged. Under these circumstances, should Congress undertake to decide, (which I hope they will not,) we are bound, in the language of the President, to "consult equally what is due to equitable considerations, and to the public interest." With that view, I would grant indemnity to the petitioners; I would relinquish to them the original cost of their merchandise, and the charges thereon, and I would rigidly exact the payment of the difference between that sum and the value of the articles in this country. The principle I adopt is this: that whatever extenuating circumstances may be urged in behalf of the late violation of law, they cannot render it a meritorious act, and therefore it ought not to be rewarded; that to remit the profits of such violation, would be to give a premium to the parties for their disobedience, by placing them in a better situation than if they had obeyed the law. Sir, neither a liberal spirit of conciliation, nor any injunction of equity, can demand for the petitioners more than indemnity; beyond that, justice to the community forbids you to go. With respect to those who shipped after a knowledge of the war, they are without a rational excuse, and merit the penalties of the law. The refusal of Congress at its last session to repeal or suspend the non-importation act, before and after the declaration of war, was sufficient warning of the policy that would be pursued during the war; and, therefore, they have knowingly violated the provisions and the policy of the law. They plead the fear of a confiscation of their property, had it remained in England, and yet the merchants are daily prosecuting a trade by which their funds are accumulating in that country. No man believes that a nation, commercial as is England, will set the example of confiscation; nor has it ever been her course of policy to do so. Release this class of importers now, and you cannot consistently refuse the same measure to those who may import hereafter; having been restrained by respect for law until after your decision, they will, in equity, have a stronger claim on the merciful interposition of Congress. In this way you will be forced to abandon the restrictive system. The advocates for unqualified remission, aware of this consequence, and fearing its influence on the minds of a majority of this body, have assailed the system with unusual acrimony. It is represented as operating with more severity upon ourselves than upon the enemy, as more terrible to the American people than pestilence; more pernicious than the plagues of Egypt.

Sir, is it the policy of this Government to be forced into an abandonment of a measure of great national concernment by a few individuals, who, influenced by motives of private interest, have subverted the views of the enemy? This House has determined, over and over again, that they would not abandon the system, and now we are called upon to do so, in point of fact, under compulsion. I say the petitioners have subverted the views of England. Why, in shipping British manufactures to this country, after a knowledge of the war, were they furnished with licenses protecting them from British captures? Was this an act of British moderation; of British justice? No. It was dictated by her interest; it was to alleviate the miseries of their starving manufacturers. Of the effects of the non-importation act upon the enemy and on the country, I need to say but little. That topic has been ably and eloquently discussed by the honorable Speaker. He has presented facts and circumstances which, while they prove indisputably that this act has carried misery and wretchedness into the heart of the British nation, it is not the cause of the partial distress which is felt in the United States. He has shown that the effects here, which are attributed to the restrictive system, have resulted from the unjust measures of England, against which that system has been directed. But, in what does the distress of the people of this country consist? Do your cities present thousands of poor wretches begging employment; begging a little food to prevent their starving in the streets? No, sir. And is such not the unhappy condition of hundreds of thousands of the people of England? The fact is undeniable. But, says the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHEVES,) this unprecedented distress in England is not owing to the restrictive system; the United States never received more than one-fourth of the whole exports of British manufactures, and therefore the distress must have resulted from other causes. Sir, the gentleman should recollect that England is now deprived of her other customers: and that, although the loss of our market, during the existence of her former prosperity, might not have been so distressing; yet that, under existing circumstances, it may be ruinous. To a man who has an abundance of the necessaries and comforts of life about him, partial losses are unimportant; but, take from him who is reduced to bare subsistence, and his situation becomes deplorable. The market of the United States is at this moment to England what bread is to a starving man. On this point it was my intention to have presented to the Committee a view of the testimony lately taken before a committee of the House of Commons, and which is now in my possession, proving the injurious operation of our act of non-importation upon the enemy. But my strength is exhausted, and I will only recapitulate, very briefly, some of the facts which were established. It was proved, by the concurrent testimony of witnesses called from different parts of the kingdom, that the distresses of the people are unprecedented and alarming; that the manufacturing poor are, to a great extent, without employment and tolerable subsistence, and that the effects of hunger were visible in their countenances; that those who had given employment to thousands from motives of humanity alone, were anxiously awaiting the decision of Parliament; and if that should be in favor of continuing the Orders in Council, they would be compelled to abandon them to their fate—inevitable starvation; that this awful state of things was owing principally to the American non-importation act, and would be removed if the American market could be again opened to them. It was also proved that South America had been tried as a substitute for the American market, but that, in every instance, it was a losing business; that experiments had been made of Amelia Island and Canada, in the hope that their manufactures might, by smuggling, find their way into the United States, and that such adventures never returned their original cost.

Sir, the consequence of this testimony was the annulment of the Orders in Council, so as to meet the provisions of your statute directing the President, in such an event, to discontinue the non-importation act. It is true, the Prince Regent, in announcing this annulment, pretends to make it a consequence of an act of the French Government, declaring the Berlin and Milan decrees at an end so far as they related to the United States. But this is proved to be a mere pretext by the official declaration of the Prince Regent himself in April last, in which he pronounces, that before the Orders in Council should be repealed or modified, France must revoke her edicts in relation to all the world; that to revoke them in relation to the United States only would not be sufficient. In the same month (June last) in which the Orders in Council were modified, the British Minister here, in a letter to Mr. Monroe, explicitly declared, in obedience to the instructions of his Government, that such were the obligations by which the Regent was bound to his allies, that he must and would continue the Orders in Council in full force, until there was a general and unqualified repeal of the French edicts. There has been no such repeal, and yet the Orders in Council are modified, and that, too, immediately after the testimony to which I have alluded was taken. With such evidence of the efficiency of your restrictive system, to repeal it directly, or to do that which will lead to its repeal, would be, in my opinion, an act of unexampled imbecility and folly. Prosecute the war vigorously, add non-exportation and non-importation, and I do verily believe you will have an honorable peace before the end of the ensuing year.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that he should not at so late a period engage in debate, if he did not suppose that some views of the subject had been hitherto unnoticed, which although less interesting than those taken by the gentlemen who had preceded him, were perhaps not entirely unworthy of attention. But he concurred in so many of the arguments of his colleagues, that in rising after them he should not encroach much upon the time of the Committee. Before he entered, however, upon the consideration of the resolution immediately in question, he begged to be allowed, in imitation of those who had addressed the Chair before him, to say something on the general policy of the non-importation law.

The effect expected from this law must have been a loss of employment and of income to those manufacturers of England whom the American market previously maintained. No restrictions were imposed upon the supply of that country with the productions of this, and the framers of the law must have calculated upon our merchants continuing to sell in England a considerable proportion of the abundant exports of the United States. But of this state of trade the accumulation of American property in England was the necessary consequence. The inconvenience which we should feel from losing the employment of our capital must have been foreseen, but it was supposed to be, and it was, less to us than the injury to England from the loss of a considerable part of her manufacturing income. But it was obvious that the proposition between the injuries suffered by the two countries under this system must continually change. However long the system might continue, the loss to England could in any one year be only the loss of that income which a year's sales of her manufactures here would have produced. To America, the loss depending upon the detention of her capital must increase in proportion to its accumulation. This result must have been expected by the framers of the law. They must have seen, that if it continued to be rigidly enforced, the mere interest on our capital detained might at length equal or exceed the value of English manufactures of which it prevented the sale. They must have seen that if peace continued to permit their accustomed direction to our exports, this change in the relative effect of the law on the two countries must in time produce either its modification or suspension. And after this time, if it continued, its injurious effect on England must have been expected to result chiefly from that irregular action on her commerce and manufactures (of which his colleague had spoken during the last session) which an alternate execution and suspension of it was calculated to produce. The manufacturer, it might be expected, would continue to view with anxiety and interest a market which he would occasionally enjoy, and would condemn the impolicy of his own Government in denying him its regular and beneficial custom. But if the temporary suspension of the law might have been supposed, even if peace had continued, not entirely to impair its utility, much less would the remission of the penalties which the committee were considering impair it. The future accumulation of our capital in England would be prevented by the laws and circumstances of war. Those who should hereafter place their funds there could have no claim to our interposition in their favor.

The honorable Speaker, Mr. L. said, had yesterday introduced his observations by a general panegyric on what he called the restrictive system. But what was this system? He had supposed it in all its different shapes of non-importation, non-intercourse, and embargo, to be an expedient to coerce foreign nations without the employment of military force. An exclusion of the manufactures of an enemy might indeed be resorted to in war. He did not deny that it might be right that we should exclude those of England now. But such an exclusion is a part of a very different system from that which the honorable gentleman applauds. It does not prevent the employment of the force of the nation. It is not the substitute of war, but its auxiliary. His friend from Kentucky was indeed the zealous and eloquent advocate of a system which in common with a majority of the House he had abandoned. In respect to the subject immediately before the Committee, Mr. L. said, that the first question seemed to be, whether the act of importing merchandise prohibited by our laws was, under the circumstances of the petitioners, such as to justify its confiscation. To decide whether there ought to be a forfeiture it seemed necessary to inquire had there been a crime? But the Speaker had anticipated nearly all that he could have been disposed to say upon this subject. He had shown conclusively the injustice of punishing those whose property had left England before our declaration of war was known there. But the same principles applied to the property which had left England since, and the numerous class of petitioners interested in this property would have had at least the argument of the Speaker, if they could not have his vote.

What was the justification of those whose property was shipped before a knowledge of war? That it was in general the act of their agents—that their instructions were to ship only when it should be legal—that they had reason to expect the suspension of the non-importation law—that their shipments were made by the advice of our highest diplomatic agent in England. Every one of these considerations applies to the cases which the Speaker excludes from remission. It was indeed said by Mr. Russell that after war the repeal of the non-importation law was no longer expected. But he still advised the shipment of American property. It was still his opinion "that such shipments might be made with safety;" "that if the law should not be annulled, the special circumstances under which the shipments were made would entitle them to an exemption from its penalties." Here was the opinion of a man with the best information to direct his judgment, with no interest that has been suggested to prevent it. In saying that the property shipped after war would be exempt from the penalties of the non-importation law, Mr. Russell said substantially that the law would be suspended as to that property. On the probability, and still more upon the occurrence of war, the merchants of every country are accustomed to receive with deference the instructions even of their Consuls. They confide in their opinions without expecting to learn their precise grounds, and it would not be the least of the evils which would grow out of the proposed policy that your citizens in foreign countries could no longer be expected to confide in the instructions of the foreign representatives of the nation.

But not only the cases of those whom the Speaker would consign to unmitigated forfeiture appeared to me (Mr. L. said) to be entitled to equal favor with those classes of cases which he had proved to be innocent; but if there were any room for discrimination, the shipments which had been made after knowledge of war, he thought more susceptible than any other of strict justification.

Was the property which an American citizen had acquired in England in violation of none of your laws to be sacrificed without any possible advantage to his country? When he could no longer himself remain in England consistently with his allegiance, was he to intrust his fortune to agents over whom he could have no superintendence or control?—against whom by law he could not maintain a suit? And if he were obliged to leave England with his property, what other ports in the civilized world but ours could have been expected to admit him? Wherever else he had gone, his cargo would have been confiscated as American property, or burned as English merchandise. Suppose him to have known that by the letter of your law his property would be liable to confiscation when brought into your country? By the letter of English law it was no less liable to confiscation while it remained there. To the mercy of one or the other Government he was obliged to trust. To which should he have trusted? To a declared enemy, or to his natural protector—his own Government?

Those who shipped before war, shipped, as the Speaker contended, on the reasonable expectation that their voyage and their profits would be lawful. But with those who shipped after war it was not merely the expectation of lawful profit. It was their only refuge from ruin.

Mr. L. said, that he already found himself fatigued, and should be able to give little more than an outline of the further views which he had intended to offer. With the exception of the Speaker, the opponents of unconditional remission appeared none of them to wish the exaction of the whole amount of any of the bonds. Hence the inquiry into the usual rate of mercantile profit, into the fine which the merchants might afford to pay, and yet make a reasonable profit on their violation of the law. The gentleman from Kentucky, who first spoke, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, appear entirely to coincide in the wish that the merchant may not be a sufferer from his importation; but cautiously to abstain from rendering the situation of him who violates worse than of him who obeys the law, is a policy better calculated to procure than to prevent its violation. Let the enforcement of laws once cease to be the object for which penalties are intended, and those penalties become in principle a tax. The "sacred principle" which the gentleman from Pennsylvania so devoutly maintains, of exacting the extraordinary profits of the merchants, is the principle of filling the Treasury as conveniently as possible, and cannot (whatever its advocates may mean) be considered as that of injuring the enemy or enforcing the law. He would dismiss therefore the subject of adherence to law, and inquire for a few moments into the propriety of exacting the extraordinary profits of the merchants on the principle of a tax.

To render a tax on importation fair, it seems essential that the time of laying it, and the rate, should be such as to allow the merchant to indemnify himself from the consumer. Although half of the goods, of which he was speaking, had been sold by the importer, this would not prevent the tax from raising their price upon the farmer—but it would be raised not so as to indemnify the importing merchant, but to enrich the intervening purchaser.

It had been said by the two gentlemen who first spoke against remission, that the extraordinary profits of the merchants were a tax upon the country, and that the Government ought at least to share in its receipt. But surely the importations of the last Fall were not so much a tax, as the remission of a tax upon the people. Had they not been made, we should have paid much more for the articles we purchase, than we now do. His friend from Georgia, however, contended that every monopoly was a tax upon the community. It was less so, however, than an entire exclusion of the article. But there was nothing like monopoly in these importations. If the bold speculator had imported, and the cautious regular merchant refrained, there would have been some room for the observation. But the urgency of the case, and the advice of your Minister, forced the most timid to ship. Had notice been received of a suspension of the law, they could only have loaded such American vessels as happened to be in port, and this they had done. An advance indeed in freight would have been the result of such a suspension, and a deduction from the profits of the importers; and an advance was the result of that general exertion of the merchants to bring home their property, which could not have been greater though our act had been suspended.

In respect to the calculations which have been made of the extravagant profits of our merchants, the attention of the Committee could hardly be expected to their details, but it might be to their principles.

The two gentlemen who first argued against remission, contended that in the estimate of the profits of the importing merchant, those derived from the state of exchange were fairly to be added to those on the sale of the imported goods. But the profit on bills of exchange is a distinct mercantile speculation, which has its risks and ought to have its profits. If an importing merchant, instead of obtaining funds in England by bills of exchange, effected the same purpose by the exportation of produce, is there any man who would propose to combine the profits of the two adventures, and carry both to the account of the last? The exporters of some of our produce would show you that the losses on the cargoes which they have shipped to Europe, consume much of the profits on their recent importations.

In respect to the policy of the exaction, in the cursory view of the question to which he was obliged to confine himself, he would say little; and nothing of its effect on the attachment and confidence of a considerable proportion of our citizens in their Government. He did not believe, however, that the interest of the Treasury would be permanently advanced by such an expedient. Were these eighteen millions a sum which the mercantile capital of the country could spare, would they be withdrawn from commerce even without this exaction? There could on this supposition be no doubt but that the merchants, who could not otherwise employ, would readily loan them to the Government. But if they were not a surplus beyond the amount of capital required for the commerce of the United States, how improvident must be the policy which, to obtain eighteen millions for the exigencies of the present year, would sacrifice that regular income of four or five millions which their employment in active commerce would otherwise produce. If the mercantile capital of the nation belonged not to private citizens, but to the Government, the most speculating financier could not invest it in a mode which would yield to the Treasury half the income which the duties on that capital now produce, and the politician who should impair this capital would exhaust in its source the future revenue of his country.

Mr. L. said, that he had attempted to show that, even in the class of cases which the House was perhaps least disposed to favor, the error of the petitioners could not justify confiscation, and that if the plan of confiscation and of a rigid execution of the law, were dismissed, no just principles of policy, and not even the interest of the Treasury could sanction an exaction which would resolve itself into a tax. But whatever disposition of the property of these merchants might be right—whether exaction or remission, or discrimination—he could see no reason why the power of taxing or fining any portion of the community, to an amount of eighteen millions, should be left to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Legislature, which prescribes the rule, properly leaves to the Executive the power of relieving from the penalty in particular cases, distinguished by peculiar circumstances from that class, within which they are included by the general terms of the law. But when not separate cases too minute for legislative inquiry or interposition, but a large class of cases is involved, embraced by the general terms of the law, but distinguished by circumstances which could not have been foreseen at its passage, the rule which is to relieve or condemn them should be prescribed by the power which can alone be safely intrusted with a control over the finances of the State. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had indeed said that the amount did not vary the principle. But in politics this was a strange opinion. Was it in principle quite as prudent to intrust the decision of a question of eighteen millions of dollars to the uncontrolled discretion of one man, as a question of a hundred or a thousand dollars? Was it in principle not more objectionable to give to one man the command of a standing army of a hundred thousand soldiers, than of a company? In politics, the most important of all principles was not to give, without necessity, even to the best man, a power which in the hands of the worst could be dangerous to public liberty. But it was evident from nearly the whole tenor of the debate, that gentlemen considered this measure as an important financial resource. If it be so, the plainest principle of our Constitution requires that it should be determined by the Legislature. The power of providing for the financial support of Government, exclusively exercised by a popular assembly, is the only adequate security for freedom, which the genius of man has yet discovered. This power of remitting penalties, even in the limited operation which could alone have been reasonably expected from it, at the passage of the first law upon the subject, was seen with suspicion and alarm by many of the ablest advocates of public liberty in that House. Among those whom an aversion to arbitrary power induced to vote against the law, was the present Secretary of the Treasury himself. Can it be supposed that this gentleman can undertake without reluctance and pain the exercise of a power, over eighteen millions of dollars, which he thought too great to be prudently intrusted to any man, when its probable operation was perhaps expected to be confined to a few thousands? The exaction of any portion of these bonds on any of the plans proposed, could, on no fair principle, be discriminated from a tax, and he would not vote to delegate to any department of Administration the most valuable prerogative of that House.

Mr. Stow.—Mr. Chairman: I always find myself considerably embarrassed when I attempt to address this House; and in the present case that embarrassment is much increased by a full sense of the importance of the subject, and of the splendor of the talents which have gone before me. If the views which have been presented by others had appeared satisfactory to me, I would not for one moment trespass on your patience, or that of the House; or, had this been like the ordinary subjects which come before the Legislature, which relate to future actions to be done or not done, and whether the law be wise or foolish, the subject may guard himself accordingly. I say, sir, if it had been of this kind, I would not have spoken; but in the present case, I feel myself acting not so much in the character of a legislator, as that of a juror, sworn to pass between my country and certain individuals in a cause of immense magnitude.

When it was first presented to me, I thought the case a simple one; but when I observed the wide range taken by the respective speakers, I began to doubt the correctness of that opinion, and I examined it again and again. From these examinations, and from a careful consideration of what has been said, I am confirmed in the truth of my first impression. And here let me remark, that the very variant opinions which have been maintained in this House, become in themselves an argument in favor of the ground I shall take. What, sir, is the question before us? Not about the efficacy or non-efficacy of the embargo, for that has long since passed away. Not whether the restrictive system ought to be pursued or abandoned. It is not an inquiry whether Great Britain profits much or little by our reception of her goods. The goods are actually here, and I presume no man proposes to send them back; nor ought it to be an inquiry, whether the merchants have made much or little by the transaction. What, then, is the inquiry? It is simply this: Under certain circumstances, twenty millions of dollars worth of goods have been imported from Great Britain; the question is, who owns them, (or the bonds which have been taken in lieu of the goods,) the United States or the importers? What, then, is our title? I have heard three distinct claims set up: 1st, that they were forfeited as a penalty; 2d, that a part was fairly ours in consequence of an unusual profit, growing out of our restrictive laws; 3d, that policy required that we should seize upon them to preserve the non-importation law; and, lastly, the most difficult to convince or persuade—the most tenacious of all claimants—are those who found their right on no one title in particular, but on all together. Sir, let me address a few words to this class of persons first; let me urge them to examine their own breasts, and see if selfishness does not lurk there; let me warn them against being swayed by a principle alike destructive of liberty and justice; against using a weapon to which they themselves may one day fall the victims. Let us not array our prejudices against the merchants—the fruits of their toils are as dear to them as ours are to us. They have families, wives, and children whom they love, and are bound to provide for—they are men like ourselves.

But, sir, to return to the specific grounds on which this sum is claimed—does it not rest on this, that they have violated a law? Is this, then, a fact? I will not spend a moment in guarding gentlemen against so absurd a construction of law, as would subject a person to its letter regardless of its spirit; such a construction would, under the law of Rome to prevent assassinations, which denounced death to the person who should draw blood in the street, have executed the surgeon who bled a man dangerously bruised! A person who violates a penal statute, I admit, justly incurs its forfeiture; but, sir, I deny that the persons before you have violated any law of their country. Their property was in England, and knowing the terms of the non-importation law, and the course which has been taken with France, they could not have entertained a doubt of its becoming imperative after the British revocation of the 23d of June. To make a penalty just, there must be a crime. Are there any evidences of a crime in this case? Is it to be found in keeping the goods so long in England lest they should violate the law? Is it in coming openly to the bosom of their country? Look at the men—many of them the most respectable merchants in your country. Their agents in England, instructed not to ship goods so as to contravene any law of their country. These and others, the most intelligent men in England, Mr. Russell, the American Minister, all uniting—for what? To commit a crime!—a crime deserving the forfeiture of twenty millions! Gracious Heavens! It is utterly impossible. I ask any gentleman in this House to put himself in the situation of the merchant, and lay his hand on his heart, and say if he would not have done the same? I am sure he will answer yes. And is every man in this House ready to acknowledge to himself that he would be guilty of a crime? Most certainly not. How, then, can he consent to punish that as a crime in another, which he is conscious he would have done himself? Suppose, instead of a forfeiture of goods, the Legislature had made the sanction of this law corporeal punishment, what would the advocates of forfeiture have said then? Is there a man in this House who would have seen his neighbor imprisoned or whipped for what he has done? Certainly not. Then, sir, how happens it that so many are ready to inflict a pecuniary punishment? Have we not reason to fear that it does not spring so much from sacred regard to the law, as from the love of that which was long ago declared to be “the root of all evil?”

Perhaps it may be urged, that all persons are bound to know the law: that may be generally true; but they are not bound to know, that a law passed with reference to one set of circumstances is to apply to a case where the circumstances are entirely different. They are bound in such a case to follow the principles of general law and the dictates of sound sense. These will be plain in many cases—they are, as I may say, engraved by the hand of nature in the heart of man. Was this such a case? Was the merchant bound to know that to avail himself of the privilege secured by treaty of removing property from an enemy's country was a crime? By what force of reasoning—by what magic—could an American citizen in England learn, that bringing away his own property—things much wanted at home—was enriching his enemy, and ruining his country? How could he comprehend that it was wise and lawful to fit out privateers at a vast expense to take British goods on board a ship, and yet that it would be injurious to his country, and highly penal to take for nothing goods from the warehouse? How could he know, that if the privateer take goods from a store it is commendable; but that if the citizen should take his own from the same store, it would be criminal? It would be hard, indeed, to punish the citizen for not perceiving what is only perceived in this House, for nowhere else does such sublime philosophy prevail! No person, who has learned to reason out of the restrictive school, can clearly comprehend that the taking away from an individual, or a nation, enriches the individual or the nation; and, therefore, that it would be highly unlawful to enrich Great Britain by bringing away her goods.

But, sir, there has been an attempt to show that those who shipped after the declaration of war was known were criminal, although the other classes were not. As the question here is about punishing most severely, and which can be justifiable only where the law is clear, perhaps it would be a sufficient objection to any such discrimination to say, that, to perceive the distinction required all the acuteness of intellect which distinguishes the honorable Speaker, and which enables him to preside over this House with so much reputation. Some, by fine-spun reasonings, have thought they had made out one class more guilty, and some another. The obvious inference from this is, that none are guilty in such a manner as to deserve a severe punishment. To subject a man to this, the law ought to be so plain, "that he who runs may read." It cannot be a rule of conduct, the discovery of which requires the aid of the most subtle metaphysics; one about which, as we have seen, the ablest speakers differ, and sometimes lose, or change the thread of their own reasonings.

I shall pass over the claims set up to a part of the profits, because what I have said goes to show that, if we have any title, it is founded on forfeiture, in consequence of a crime, and therefore is applicable to the whole, if any; and because the impolicy and absurdity of the United States becoming partners in trade, and allowing their laws to be violated as part of the stock, have been so fully exposed by yourself and others, that I can add nothing to the clearness of the subject.

If, sir, I have been correct in my reasoning relative to the penalty, little will need be said as to the policy of taking the goods or money, because nothing can be politic which is unjust. But, say some, if these goods are allowed to escape, it is setting a precedent for all other violations of the law, and giving up the restrictive system at once. Sir, it can be no precedent but for like cases; and to make a like case, there must be millions of American property in England; there must be a repeal of orders known there, to be unknown to the Legislature here; and, last of all, a war which will oblige the citizen to remain with his property in an enemy's country—to return penniless to his own, or to trust himself and his property to the magnanimity of his country. When all these things shall have happened, the case will be like, and the men who shall conduct like your petitioners will be innocent. And, sir, who is there that would punish an innocent man for fear that at some future time one might become guilty? Such an idea shocks every feeling of justice—it would become an infernal rather than a man.

The seizing of these goods is highly impolitic in another point of view. It is this: Your enemy calculates better than any other nation the duration of the resources of her enemy. Will she believe you in earnest, and come to just and honorable terms, while she sees you shrink from laying a broad and solid basis for revenue, and resorting to such petty expedients as fines and forfeitures, with which to carry on war? Certainly not. We ought to show to her and to the world, that we are able and willing to carry on the war till we can obtain ample justice. We are at the beginning of an arduous contest—a contest in which we want the whole energies of the country. Is it then a time to plunder one class of our fellow-citizens and alienate their affections? Surely not. But, say some, the merchants are alienated already; they will do nothing for their country. Away with these dictates of prejudice. They are totally unfounded. True it is, that when driven from their livelihoods, they have shown a restlessness which all men would show; but they are as upright, as patriotic, as their fellow-citizens. They are ready to join you for the honor of their country—to lend you money, and furnish every means in their power. They only beg of you to receive them as brethren, and not to plunder them as enemies. Besides, what will you get by the attempt? The informers get fifty per cent, leaving you but fifty; the duties amount to as much as to leave but fifteen per cent. And for this paltry sum you are about to give up the duty bonds, and attempt the collection of the penalty bonds. Mark my words, sir, you will not get near as much by way of penalty as you would by duty.

Again, what an extraordinary spectacle does our Government exhibit on this occasion! The President (who is to be considered as speaking the united counsels of the Cabinet) recommends the subject to the consideration of the Legislature for their decision. On the other hand, according to the friends of the Secretary of the Treasury, he stands with eager eyes, saying, "let me have it—let me have it." And will you transfer what is your duty to any other hands? Will you deliver over hundreds of your fellow-citizens to receive their doom at the hands of any individual? Suppose an analogous case had occurred in federal times, and suppose the applicants had been farmers, would you have endured it? No; the country would have been in a flame, from Georgia to New Hampshire, and, justly so. Does the Secretary want such a tremendous power over his fellow-citizens? That of itself would be to me a sufficient reason for withholding it. Does he shrink from it, as I trust he does? I would not ask him to perform an act which will send him down to posterity loaded with the curses of his fellow-citizens.

Sir, this is not a question about future policy, but one of property. The inquiry is, do the merchants own these goods, or does the nation? The only title we have to them is that of penalty. To make a penalty just, there must have been a crime; but here there has been no crime. They have done what all prudent men would have done, and now rely with manly confidence on the justice and magnanimity of their country.

When Mr. Stow had concluded, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

IMPRISONMENT OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. BASSETT offered to the House the following resolution:

Whereas, It is represented, that Great Britain has seized sundry persons fighting under the American flag, laying claims to them alike incompatible with justice and the rights of the United States as an independent nation:

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before this House the information he has received on that subject, and the measures taken to redress an evil which violates the rights and interests, and outrages the feelings of a free and independent people.

Mr. BASSETT stated that several cases had come to his knowledge in which the British naval commanders had seized persons taken on board of American armed vessels, and confined them, in one instance, in irons, and in another had transported them to England for trial. It was not his intention now to go into an examination of these cases. Such an examination was not necessary to authorize the House to call for the information required. He had given its present form to the motion he had offered, because its adoption would go to show that the Councils of the nation were not indifferent to this subject. It would, he trusted, further enable the Executive to show that it never slumbered on any occasion in which the rights of the people were concerned; and he had no doubt the information to be received would show it. When it was received, the House might take what course it pleased; perhaps no legislative act would grow out of it. But it was proper, in any event, that the House should be in possession of information required.

Mr. MILNOR said he had no objection to the call for information, but he excepted to the form of the resolution, for two reasons. It was prefaced by a preamble, which was not usual in such cases, which preamble, moreover, assumed, as fact, circumstances of which the House had no official or authentic information. His other objection was, that it expressed an opinion on a point on which he was not ready to express one. Mr. M.

said he knew not the extent of the evil of which the gentleman complained. If it was merely that Great Britain laid claim to her own subjects fighting our battles against her, he would at least not say that this was an act on the part of Great Britain deserving all those severe epithets which the gentleman had thought proper to attach to it. The resolution stated facts not before the House, and expressed an opinion on an act the degree of enormity of which depended on the circumstances respecting which it was proposed to ask for information. Mr. M. wished that the House should not lightly be compelled into a discussion of this subject, and especially as the gentleman had intimated the probability that no legislative act was to grow out of the information called for.

Mr. SEYBERT said, as his colleague's principal objection to the motion appeared to be a difficulty as to facts, he hoped to procure his vote for its adoption by stating at least one which had come to his knowledge. I, said Mr. S., had the honor to have a nephew on board the ship Wasp. He informed me this morning that after they had been carried into Bermuda several of their crew were taken and confined in irons; that he saw them in that situation; and that their crime was, having fought the battles of our country. What may be my colleague's feelings on this occasion, I know not—I hope they are honorable to himself and the House—for myself I wish the subject investigated. Mr. S. concluded by expressing his hope that the resolution would pass.

Mr. MACON said he was anxious to obtain information on this subject, but doubted the propriety of the preamble. After the information was received it would be time enough to express an opinion on the subject. He had no doubt that we must at last come to the determination to protect every man that is on board of a ship of the United States. It is what Great Britain herself does; and in this respect we ought to follow her example. If these people undertake to fight our battles we ought to protect them. Mr. M. said he was opposed to the preamble, because he did not wish to give reasons to the departments of the Government for any call for information the House thought proper to make; it was enough that the House should ask for it, and the President should give or withhold it. The practice heretofore was against the course now pursued.

Mr. BIGELOW said he had no objection to the call for information, divested of the preamble and the opinion expressed in it, except that it did not go far enough. He proposed to amend it by adding thereto the following words, "accompanied with all the evidence in his possession, which will tend to show whether such persons are American citizens or British subjects."

Mr. BASSETT said he was indifferent as to the form provided he obtained the substance; he, therefore, should submit to such modification as the gentleman from North Carolina should think proper to make. But, said Mr. B., as it has been said that there is no information before the House, I state that I understand and it is my belief that six men of the crew of the United States brig

Nautilus, were detained and sent to England for trial; and that Commodore Rodgers had detained as hostages for their safety twelve British subjects. I state also to the House that I understand and believe that six seamen of another armed vessel have been detained, and that General Pinckney had detained a like number of British subjects. I state that I have received information that the boatswain of the Wasp had been put in irons after she was taken. These violations of humanity and the law of nations I believe to require retaliation. When I voted against a bill on this subject (Mr. WRIGHT'S) it was not because I was opposed to retaliation. No, sir; retaliation in war is often mercy—it puts an end to those cruelties which would otherwise frequently disgrace parties at war, and is indispensable in the conduct of hostilities.

Mr. B. having withdrawn his motion, it was substituted by the following, offered by Mr. MACON:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House any information which may be in his possession touching the conduct of British officers towards persons taken in American armed ships.”

Mr. RANDOLPH said he trusted that the resolution now before the House would meet with no objection; although against the resolution as first proposed, he must have voted for it, notwithstanding all the odium which might have attached to such a vote. He hoped, he said, that rigorous retaliation would take place if our countrymen found in arms had been treated as criminals and not as prisoners of war. He hoped we should have ample atonement for every drop of American blood which should be spilt in such manner. Having taken occasion to pay a handsome compliment to the gallantry of our Navy, which was not heard with sufficient distinctness to be reported, Mr. R. concluded by hoping there would be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. MILNOR said he thought it due to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BASSETT) to state that, owing to the noise which prevailed in the House, he had not before heard the statement which the gentleman had now been kind enough to make. He had heard of no such case as that alluded to by his colleague; but he trusted he had been sufficiently guarded not to commit himself, even to the most invidious construction, as opposed to a proper investigation of this subject. To the present motion he yielded his perfect acquiescence. Mr. M. said he trusted that in anything that related to the honor of the country in the contest in which we are now engaged, whatever might have been his opinion of the propriety of entering into it, he should not be found more backward than other gentlemen in sustaining the just rights of the nation.

Mr. SHEFFEY said, if American citizens had been treated in the manner represented, he was clearly of opinion that severe retaliation ought to follow. But did gentlemen pretend that a British subject, running away from a British vessel, and found on board of one of ours, was to be considered as entitled to be treated as a prisoner of war? Could this doctrine be asserted by any gentleman? He presumed not. The resolution, as it now stood, would not elicit the facts material as to this point. He, therefore, moved to amend it, by inserting, after the word “persons,” the words “other than British subjects.”

Mr. SEYBERT said he was happy to hear the declaration last made by his colleague (Mr. MILNOR.) He hoped the amendment first offered would be rejected with disdain. [The SPEAKER declared that such language was not proper in debate, the expression being too strong, and such as sometimes led to a personal altercation, always to be avoided.] Mr. S. thanked the Speaker for his caution; he meant no personality; but he thought it did not become this House to debate whether the persons in question were British subjects or not, when they had been put in irons for fighting the battles of the country. Let the proof rest on the aggressor on national law and the violator of the rules of war. He hoped the House would without hesitation reject the amendment. I may go too far, said he, by stating too much; but I will say thus much without risk of contradiction: that the boatswain of the Wasp, a warrant officer of the United States, had been twelve years within the United States and has a wife and children here. These, I hope, are sufficient characteristics to insure him our support: I will give him mine, and have no doubt the House will do the same.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that the proposed amendment brought strongly to view the impropriety of the House, on the rude suggestions of any member, committing itself hastily by a definite determination which to-morrow they might be disposed to retract. He believed this was one of those cases in which there was no necessity for haste. The House would be as competent to-morrow, to decide on the subject of the resolution and the proposed amendment, and in a manner to redound, at least, as much to the credit of the House and the national good, as now. With regard to his own opinions, if they were of any importance with his worthy colleague, he would at once say they were on this subject the opinions of that man, from whom he never did dissent but upon one question, without being wrong—that man who was emphatically called for eight years our Commander-in-Chief—the founder of this nation—the author of the Constitution—our first President—the man who was made for the office, and the office for him—the man who discharged all its duties so perfectly, as if it had been only to show those who come after him their incompetency. Mr. R. said he would ask his worthy colleague, what he supposed would have been the fate of a certain Benedict Arnold, had he been brought alive to the American camp, after his desertion from it? On that subject there can be but one opinion. On another question, if his opinion was of any value, he would state it. It was not a loose thought, taken upon the impulse of the moment; but the result of meditation and reflection. As long as foreigners, naturalized by our laws, remain on our soil, he was ready to throw over them the mantle of the Constitution—he would protect them, as he would protect the native citizen, at the hazard of the last shilling of the public revenue, and the last drop of the blood of our people. But, when they go abroad on the high seas; when they come to this country to acquire a neutrality of character, now indeed no longer to be found here; when they come here only to neutralize goods in the Baltic, at Heligoland, in the Black Sea, the White Sea, and the Red Sea, and the passing to and fro on the highway of nations; if it please God, their old master George the Third, or Napoleon, or Alexander of Russia, should lay his hand on them, they were welcome, Mr. R. said, for him. He would not spend one shilling, one drop of American blood, to redeem such a man; much less would he have retaliation executed on subjects of the nation claiming him, with whom we should happen to come in collision, which might have to be expiated by the native blood of these States. I would not, said Mr. R., have the New England man or old Virginian executed by any despot, limited or unlimited in authority, in order to secure to us the worthless property in the man who is a Christian in Christendom and a Mussulman in Turkey. But, Mr. R. asked, did not this question assume a different shape, when this man was not going to and fro on the high seas in search of plunder, which he calls patriotism, but, when he is found in a public ship of war of the United States? On that subject—for it was a new question—he was not prepared to decide. It was not, Mr. R. said, and the House might rely on it, the sentiment of the people of these States—it might be of some comparatively small, and therefore only insignificant section of the community—that we should enter into a contestation with France and England for property in their subjects.

Mr. R. here drew a comparison between the practice of harboring slaves in some of our Northern cities, Philadelphia for instance, and the countenance given in this country to European emigrants. As to these foreigners, Mr. R. said he owed them nothing. He was sorry they had ever found refuge here—he wished we had driven them from our shores—or have permitted them, as we have the merchants, to go out where they pleased, without attempting to protect them.

Mr. QUINCY rose, he said, simply to express his regret, that a debate in this form and manner should have arisen. The question which had been touched, was one which required all the information and light which could be shed on it. The principles connected with it were so numerous and critical, that it required all the reflection of which gentlemen were capable, to enable them to discuss and decide it in a proper manner. He rose also to express his regret that a motion for amendment should be made, by a gentleman with whom he frequently coincided in opinion, which went to exclude information of the manner in which officers treated persons other than British subjects. He could not vote against receiving information of any kind—particularly on a subject so interesting. Mr. Q. was proceeding in his remarks, when—

Mr. SHEFFEY withdrew his motion.

Mr. BASSETT explained his ideas of expatriation. He would not protect the man who had left the country with an intention not to return, &c., but he would protect the man who went out to fight the battles of the country.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose for the purpose of moving an amendment. He adverted to the language of the resolution, and drew a distinction between the character of privateers and of our public armed vessels. Was it competent, he asked, to the Government to receive as testimony the statement of the commander or crew of an American corsair? It was well known too, he remarked, that the high wages which had been paid to the crews of the privateers, was one of the reasons why the American Navy was in some degree unmanned. And, was it not a different question, whether we should interpose our authority between the subject of a foreign nation and his Government, when that subject is fighting your battles, bleeding on the deck of your public ship, at twelve dollars a month, and when he is decoyed into a corsair by the temptation of eighty, fifty, or forty dollars a month? There is a difference, sir, said Mr. R. I trust, said he, if we receive the information we are about to ask, we shall get it from a pure and authorized source, such as no man can question. I mean the commanders of our public ships of war. Mr. R. concluded by moving to strike out "American," and insert "public," so as to read "public armed ships."

Mr. WINGERY expressed his surprise at the various expedients resorted to, to embarrass this question; and hoped this would have the same fate as the other. He said he could tell the gentleman that many privateers had been manned without a cent of wages. But, suppose they had been manned in other ways, were not privateers as useful in annoying the enemy as public ships? No man that knew anything about maritime affairs would deny it. Wherever our privateers had come across an armed vessel of the enemy, of anything like equal force, they had done their duty like American tars. We are at war, Mr. W. said, and ought to check the enemy wherever we come in contact with them. He believed the privateering carried on had been of great advantage to us and injury to our enemy. As to the objection which had been offered to receiving the statement of their commanders, what were gentlemen afraid of? No disparagement to the commanders of the Navy, (for he respected them all,) he knew gentlemen commanding privateers whose opinions were entitled to as great respect as that of any other, and whose word could not be questioned. In relation to the cases referred to in the resolve, particularly that of the boatswain, Mr. W. said we were bound by every principle of the law of nations to support him to the last cent of our money, more especially as he had a warrant under the seal of the United States. The conduct of our enemy was the less justifiable, as she manned her own ships with people of all nations.

Mr. RANDOLPH's proposed amendment was negatived by a large majority; and the resolution was agreed to without further debate or opposition.

THURSDAY, December 10.

On motion of Mr. HARPER, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting an elementary treatise for the discipline of the Army and militia of the United States.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of merchants' bonds.

Mr. GRUNDY observed, that it was not his intention to enter into a minute and detailed examination of the subject; it was the duty of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means to do so, and they had certainly performed it in a manner highly satisfactory to the House. There were, however, some general principles involved in this discussion, on which the decision of the question must ultimately depend; to these he should confine the remarks which he was about to make, except so far as a reply to the observations of others, from whom he differed in opinion, might be deemed necessary. What, sir, is the true character of the question before you? and who are the men who ask relief? The answer is an obvious one: by the violation of the penal laws of the country, the sum of twenty millions of dollars has been forfeited to the people of the United States. The infractors of the laws (acknowledged to be such by the very act of petitioning) now ask an entire remission of the penalties incurred. Before this is done, you will certainly look at that course of policy which the Government has pursued in relation to this subject, as well as the conduct of the petitioners. To show the first, we need only look to the occurrences of last session: at an early period, a proposition to suspend the non-importation act was made by a gentleman from South Carolina; after a full discussion, it was either abandoned by the proposer or negatived by the House. To permit the entry of the British manufactured articles of which the late importations consist, was the avowed object. Some time afterwards, an attempt to modify the law, so as to effect the same object, was made; this was also disapproved of. After the declaration of war, a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. RICHARDSON) moved an entire repeal of the restrictive system: this met the fate of the two former propositions. Thus did this House, on three different applications, declare that the non-importation act should remain the law of the land, and perhaps no case has ever occurred upon which this House pronounced so decisive an opinion; for the subject was presented in every shape of which it was susceptible, and the result was the same. What, sir, has followed? The petitioners have, in point of fact, repealed the law which you refused to repeal; they have trodden under foot that policy which you declared should be preserved as sacred; and they now ask you to give an after-sanction to their conduct. You had their cases as fully before you at the last session as at present; for all remember, that your table groaned beneath the weight of their petitions. After a full examination, you rejected their applications; and if the prayer of these petitioners is now granted, may it not be said, with truth, that these men have overruled the law and the lawmakers? This, sir, is a state of things which in a Republic can never be permitted. We justly boast this is a Government of laws; and unless you cause the laws to be respected, and the will of the people to be regarded, when expressed through the medium of their legitimate organs, there is no way by which the refractory members of the community can be kept within the proper limits, and prevented from disturbing the harmony of society, as well as the just and necessary policy of the country.

Let us now inquire, what has been the conduct of the petitioners and how far that entitles them to the favorable interposition of this House? The non-importation law was adopted for the purpose of bringing Great Britain to a sense of justice. It was intended that its operation should be felt by the subjects of that nation, and that, by their sufferings, the Ministry should be brought to yield to our just claims; in fact, the great object was to produce a pressure upon the manufactures of that nation, and thereby produce a change of measures towards us. How was this to be effected? Only in one way: which was by preventing as far as possible the purchase of British manufactures; for it was in making the purchase and payment, that the relief was afforded, which was intended to be withheld. In attaining this object, our Government was compelled to consult the means within its power. To have declared it penal to purchase British manufactures in England would have been idle; the law would have been inoperative; to say nothing of the doubtfulness of the question, how it is competent in a nation to punish an act which has taken place beyond its limits and within the jurisdiction of a distinct independent sovereignty. In practice, the effect of such a law would have been defeated by the remoteness of the place at which the act was committed, and the difficulty of procuring testimony. There was then left that method only which was adopted, to declare by law that those articles should not be imported to this country, as the means by which to prevent their purchase in England. I have stated, and no reflecting man will, I am sure, controvert it, that to produce a pressure upon the manufactures in England was the object of the law, and every commercial man so understood it. How far have the petitioners co-operated with their own Government? Sir, instead of endeavoring to give efficacy to your measures, they have, from the day when you designed that the effects of this law should be felt by the enemy, been engaged in vesting their capital in British manufactures, and thereby furnishing that relief which was intended by this Government to be withheld. This fact is fully manifested upon the face of their own petitions. Do the circumstances present the applicants in such a point of view to this body as to entitle them to the relief claimed by them? Not content with that profit which the fair merchant gains in times of peace and unembarrassed trade, they ask permission to enjoy that extraordinary profit which is produced by their having violated the laws of the country, and thereby procured a monopoly in the market. If the non-importation law had not existed, instead of the value of twenty millions, near three times that amount would have been imported. Of course the quantity being greater, the competition among the importers would have been increased, and the profits on any given sum would be less.

It is required of us, not only to give to these men their capital invested in British goods, under the circumstances I have named, with the ordinary profits of trade, but we are asked to give them a bounty for their transgressions. In short, they solicit permission to tax the community at discretion, and this privilege is to be bestowed on them for the sole reason, that they have violated the laws of their country. That the importers, who have already made sales, have laid an unreasonable and unprecedented advance on the prime cost of every article is admitted, and that those who have not sold will have it completely in their power to do so, no man can controvert. I wish gentlemen to reflect who is to pay this hitherto unheard of profit of the importer. The consumers, we all know, pay this when they purchase of the retailers. Already then has the community been taxed to a considerable amount, and these petitioners, if this bill shall pass, are to have the whole benefit.

Suppose, as the honorable member from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) has stated, "That had the Orders in Council been repealed, and the intelligence had reached this country before the 18th day of June, last, that war would not have been declared," I ask, whether it may not fairly be inferred from occurrences which have taken place, but that for the relief afforded by the American merchants to the manufacturers in England, the Orders in Council would have been repealed at an earlier period and of course the war would not have been declared. It should be recollected, for the evidence taken in the House of Commons clearly proves it, (and it is presumed that each member has examined that testimony,) that the Ministry of England did not abandon their Orders in Council voluntarily, but were compelled to do so by the sufferings of their own people, and surely that distress which at last produced their repeal would have operated so as to produce the effect at an earlier period, had no supplies been furnished from this country. If the gentleman from New York be correct in his hypothesis, I do not think it too harsh to say that the conduct of the petitioners and others in similar circumstances has produced this war. Let it, however, be distinctly understood, that I differ entirely from that gentleman in the opinion by him expressed, "that the Orders in Council were the only cause of war." Independent of them, there were other great causes which demanded an assertion of our rights by force, causes which still exist and require a vigorous prosecution of the war—but this is not a proper time to go into a discussion of the points in difference between the two nations, and I therefore forbear to detain the House by an examination of them.

Gentlemen have assumed a strange highminded position in this argument, the force of which I confess is beyond my comprehension. They say you must remit the whole of these forfeitures or exact the utmost farthing, or the consequence will be, that you prostrate the dignity of your laws. I appeal to you, sir, whether it be not possible to mingle justice and mercy together. Can you not punish without destroying? Can you not save from ruin while you do away the motives to a repetition of an offence? And on the score of preserving your laws from future violations, which is most likely to succeed, the infliction of a mild punishment, or none at all? A man of plain common sense would answer, without hesitation, the former. In the event of an entire remission of the forfeitures, you invite, nay more, you hold out a strong temptation to others to violate the non-importation law. But, if you enforce the penalties to a certain extent, you deprive them of the prospect of gain, and of course leave no inducement for either the petitioners or others to act in a similar manner. Sir, let us examine the nature of the claim which these men affect to have on the Government. They allege that they had funds in England to the amount of the prime cost of the goods imported, and that it was not possible to withdraw these funds in specie. Be it so. If the specie could have been procured, no argument in their favor, it is admitted by their advocates, could have been urged with propriety. How, then, does the subject present itself for a fair decision? The petitioners have funds in England; they desire to get them to their own country, but cannot do so without introducing articles prohibited by law; they do import goods forfeited the moment they arrive in an American port; the Government seizes them, but says to the importer, although the whole of this property is forfeited to the American people, yet the amount in specie which you had in England shall be restored to you, but you shall not lay the citizens of the United States under contribution. You may enjoy your capital unimpaired, but both the extraordinary and ordinary profits shall be withheld from you. By acting in this way, you guard your laws from future infractions; you teach those who are disposed to act improperly, that they cannot profit by it. I entreat those who are friendly to the non importation law to look at the consequences which must follow the passage of this bill. It is stated by the New York committee, that American property, situated precisely like that on which we are legislating, still remains in England. If the present petitioners succeed, how can you refuse the same thing to others equally deserving the indulgent consideration of the House? The arguments of those who hereafter import will be stronger, because, in addition to those now used, they can urge, the decision on this bill as a precedent in their favor, and under the pretext of property purchased in England by American citizens, British goods, (I mean goods belonging to British subjects,) will be brought to this country equal to the demand in the market; and let not gentlemen imagine they can prevent this by requiring evidence of the time of purchase. Men in England, starving for want of employment, will find testimony to help them to a market; and I am sorry to admit it, but the fact is so, they will find men in this country disposed to assist them.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) for whose opinions no member on this floor entertains a higher opinion than I do, has said that, by not passing this bill, we are authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to impose a tax on these men at his discretion. Sir, this view of the subject is a mistaken one, if I know anything of the principles of taxation. It may be considered as the assessment of a sum of money upon the community, or particular portions of it, without regard to their past conduct; it falls alike upon the virtuous and vicious; upon those who have observed, as those who have violated, the laws of the country; the past is not regarded, it operates prospectively altogether. Far different is the case before you; here, the property has already been forfeited, and has, under existing laws, been vested in the American people, and the attempt made by those who are opposed to the remission is not to clothe the Secretary with any new powers, but to prevent these men from depriving the community of that which is at this time public property.

The law vesting the Secretary with the power to remit fines and forfeitures is strangely misunderstood. It is represented as a law of rigor and severity—this is not its true character. It contains those provisions only which are calculated to mitigate the punishment inflicted by penal laws. No man is bound to apply to the Secretary; if he chooses to submit to the operation of the laws, he can do so. It is only in cases where the party is of opinion that the laws ought not to be enforced to their full extent, that an application to the Secretary of the Treasury for a remission or mitigation is contemplated, and this power of softening the rigor of the laws in every well-regulated society exists in some department of the Government.

This law is now complained of as being tyrannical in its principles, but gentlemen have certainly failed to prove this in argument; it rests on assertion only. On the other hand, it has the strongest reasons in its favor. It was passed in Federal times. This should give it the sanction of a certain class of politicians. No attempts were made to repeal it when the Republicans came into power; so far from it, they have acquiesced and practised under its provisions for twelve years, and never before the present session has a complaint been heard. Gentlemen, I apprehend, on reflection, do not find much cause for exultation in having discovered that the present Secretary of the Treasury voted against this law when a member of Congress, and having urged that as a reason why he was an improper person to act under it. True, this disclosure excited a smile on the countenances of some, but it was evident, that it was not the smile of benevolence or good humor, but proceeded from very different feelings. What, sir, does all this amount to? Mr. Gallatin, when a member of Congress, voted against a particular bill; it, however, became a law. Several years afterwards he is called to an important office, the duties of which require him to execute this law. It certainly does not follow, that because he voted against the law, that he will not execute it faithfully. Might it not with much more propriety be urged, that he who voted against a declaration of war, should not be trusted with the sword of his country under any circumstances? Or, that he who voted against any increase of the Navy, should never be permitted to fight for his country on the ocean? Or, that the member of a Legislature who had voted against any important measure which had to be enforced by the judiciary, should never sit as a judge when questions under such a law were to be decided on?

The gentleman to my right, (Mr. LOWNDES,) had, without well considering the import of what he was saying, declared, that the Government will profit more by returning this twenty millions of dollars to the merchants than by retaining it, and appears to have convinced himself that we shall annually get five millions in duties from them for this twenty millions. If, sir, I could believe this, I would certainly vote with him; and not only would I do this, but I would be in favor of borrowing to the full amount of the nation's credit, and give it to the merchants. We could no doubt borrow at eight per cent., and if we could then, by giving it away to that class of men who seem, in the opinion of some gentlemen entitled to all favor, obtain twenty-five per cent., the war, and all the expenses of the Government, would not be felt. But, sir, this plan of making money is too favorable to be well-founded, and, before I can accord with it, my judgment must be better satisfied. I am afraid to make the experiment.

We are told, if a remission does not take place, great dissatisfaction will prevail among the merchants; they will not lend their money, and will embarrass you in the prosecution of the war. Sir, believe me, it is not by doing injustice to the rest of the community, in order to keep the merchants in good humor, that you will be enabled to get on in the war advantageously. As to obtaining money on loans, make it the interest of the money-holder to lend to the Government, and he will do so; and, when he is deliberating on the subject, the great inquiry generally is, whether this is the most profitable way of disposing of his capital.

Were I disposed to intimidate gentlemen on this occasion, I could tell them of another class of citizens who have an interest in this question. A class of men composing nine-tenths of the community, who, when they do speak, will and must be heard with effect.

Mr. BOYD, Mr. RHEA, and Mr. CLAY, spoke in opposition to a total remission of the bonds—each however advocating a partial remission of a certain description of the bonds.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, December 11.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented petitions of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that further time may be granted to complete the payments for public lands; that the Indian title to certain lands in that Territory may be extinguished; and that a division of that Territory may not take place. The first was referred to a Committee of the Whole, the second to the Secretary of War, and the third ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures was instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for placing beacons and buoys on two rocks in or near the harbor of New Haven, in Connecticut.

MACEDONIAN AND FROLIC.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, from Captain Decatur, of the frigate "United States," reporting his combat and capture of the British frigate Macedonian. Too much praise cannot be bestowed on that officer and his companions on board, for the consummate skill and conspicuous valor by which this trophy has been added to the naval arms of the United States.

I transmit, also, a letter from Captain Jones, who commanded the sloop of war Wasp, reporting his capture of the British sloop of war, the Frolic, after a close action, in which other brilliant titles will be seen to the public admiration and praise.

A nation feeling what it owes to itself and to its citizens could never abandon to arbitrary violence on the ocean, a class of them which gives such examples of capacity and courage, in defending their rights on that element; examples which ought to impress on the enemy, however brave and powerful, a preference of justice and peace, to hostility against a country whose prosperous career may be accelerated, but cannot be prevented, by the assaults made on it.

JAMES MADISON,

WASHINGTON, December 11, 1812.

U. S. SHIP UNITED STATES, AT SEA,
October 30, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the 25th instant, being in the latitude 29° north, longitude 29° 30 west, we fell in with, and, after an action of one hour and a half, captured His Britannic Majesty's ship Macedonian, commanded by Captain John Carden, and mounting forty-nine carriage guns, (the odd gun shifting.) She is a frigate of the largest class, two years old, four months out of dock, and reputed one of the best sailers in the British service. The enemy being to windward, had the advantage of engaging us at his own distance; which was so great that, for the first half hour, we did not use our carronades, and at no moment was he within the complete effect of our musketry or grape. To this circumstance, and a heavy swell which was on at the time, I ascribe the unusual length of the action.

The enthusiasm of every officer, seaman, and marine, on board this ship, on discovering the enemy, their steady conduct in battle, and the precision of their fire, could not be surpassed. Where all have met my fullest expectations it would be unjust in me to discriminate. Permit me, however, to recommend to your particular notice my first lieutenant, William H. Allen. He has served with me upwards of five years, and to his unremitted exertions in disciplining the crew is to be imputed the obvious superiority of our gunnery exhibited in the result of this contest.

Subjoined is a list of the killed and wounded on both sides. Our loss, compared with that of the enemy, will appear small. Amongst our wounded you will observe the name of Lieutenant Funk, who died a few hours after the action; he was an officer of great gallantry and promise, and the service sustained a severe loss in his death.

The Macedonian lost her mizzenmast, fore and main-topmasts, and main-yard, and was much cut up in her hull.

The damage sustained by this ship was not such as to render her return into port necessary; and had I not deemed it important that we should see our prize in, should have continued our cruise.

With the highest consideration and respect, I am, sir, your obedient humble servant.

STEPHEN DECATUR.

HON. PAUL HAMILTON.

NEW YORK November 24, 1812.

SIR: I here avail myself of the first opportunity of informing you of occurrences of our cruise, which terminated in the capture of the Wasp, on the 18th of October, by the Poictiers, of seventy-four guns, while a wreck from damages received in the engagement with the British sloop of War Frolic, of twenty-two guns, sixteen of them thirty-two-pound carronades, four twelve-pounders on the main deck, and two twelve-pound carronades on the top-gallant forecabin; making her superior in force to us by four twelve-pounders. The Frolic had struck to us, and was taken possession of two hours before our surrendering to the Poitiers.

We had left the Delaware on the 13th; the 16th had a heavy gale, in which we lost our jib-boom and two men; half past eleven on the night of the 17th, in latitude 37 degrees north, and longitude 65 degrees west, we saw several sail, two of them appearing very large; we stood for them for some time, then shortened sail, and steered the remainder of the night the course we had perceived them on. At day-light, on Sunday the 18th, we saw them ahead; gave chase, and soon discovered them to be a convoy of six sail, under the protection of a sloop of war; four of them large ships, mounting from sixteen to eighteen guns. At thirty-two minutes past eleven A. M., we engaged the sloop of war, having first received her fire at the distance of fifty or sixty yards, which space we gradually lessened until we laid her on board, after a well supported fire of forty-three minutes; and although so near, while loading our last broadside, that our rammers were shoved against the side of the enemy, our men exhibited the same alacrity which they had done during the whole of the action. They immediately surrendered upon our gaining their forecastele, so that no loss was sustained on their side after boarding.

Our maintop-mast was shot away between four and five minutes from the commencement of the firing, and falling, together with the maintopsail-yard, across the larboard fore and fore-topsail braces, rendered our head-yards unmanageable the remainder of the action. At eight minutes, the gaff and mizzen topgallant-mast came down, and at twenty minutes from the beginning of the action every brace and most of the rigging was shot away. A few minutes after separating from the Frolic both her masts fell upon deck; the mainmast going close by the deck, and the foremast going twelve or fifteen feet above it.

The courage and exertions of the officers and crew fully answered my expectations and wishes. Lieutenant Biddle's active conduct contributed much to our success, by the exact attention paid to every department during the engagement, and the animating example he afforded the crew by his intrepidity. Lieutenants Rogers, Booth, and Mr. Rapp, showed, by incessant fire from their divisions, that they were not to be surpassed in resolution or skill. Mr. Knight, and every other officer, acted with a courage and promptitude highly honorable, and I trust have given assurance that they may be relied on whenever their services may be required.

I could not ascertain the exact loss of the enemy, as many of the dead lay buried under the masts and spars that had fallen on deck, which two hours' exertion had not sufficiently removed. Mr. Biddle, who had charge of the Frolic, states that, from what he saw, and from information from the officers, the number killed must have been about thirty, and that of the wounded about forty or fifty; of the killed, is her first lieutenant and sailing-master; of the wounded, Captain Winyates, and the second lieutenant.

We had five killed and five wounded, as per list: the wounded are recovering. Lieutenant Claxton, who was confined by sickness, left his bed a little previous to the engagement, and though too weak to be at his division, remained on deck, and showed, by his composed manner of noting its incidents, that we had lost by his illness the services of a brave officer.

I am, respectfully, &c.

JACOB JONES.

Hon. PAUL HAMILTON.

The Message and documents having been read—
On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, they were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to report a suitable expression of the Legislative approbation of the services detailed.

Mr. R. said he did not wish by this motion to limit the Committee to reporting a resolution; or to preclude them from expressing approbation in a more substantial manner.

MERCHANTS' BONDS

The House again in Committee of the Whole on this subject.

After some debate—

The question was taken on the adoption of the report of the resolution recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, in the following words:

“Resolved, That it is inexpedient to legislate upon the subject, and that the petition, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury”—

And negatived: for the resolution 49, against it 52.

Several motions were then offered by different gentlemen, in accordance with the ideas advanced by them in debate, and negatived.

Mr. CHEVES proposed the following resolution to the Committee.

“Resolved, on viewing all the facts which have been presented, and considering them in connexion with the proper policy of a just, free, enlightened, and consequently lenient Government, under the circumstances of this country at this crisis, that, in all fair cases of bona fide American property, the penalties and forfeitures incurred by the late importers of British manufactures be unconditionally remitted.”

This motion was negatived by a majority of eight votes.

Mr. H. CLAY then proposed the following resolution:

“Resolved, That so far as respects the case of citizens of the United States who purchased goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth, production or manufacture of Great Britain, prior to the 2d February, 1811, and of citizens of the United States who shipped similar goods, between the 23d day of June and first of August, 1812, on board of vessels which actually cleared out of British ports prior to the said first day of August, the petitioners ought to be relieved by a remission of the forfeitures and penalties which they have incurred upon payment of legal costs; and that in all other cases of the petitioners, a recovery of the forfeitures and penalties incurred ought to be enforced.”

Mr. RHEA moved to amend the same by striking out all the resolution to the words “prior to,” and inserting the following words in place thereof, viz:

“To the second day of March, 1811—the petitioners ought to be relieved, by a remission of the forfeitures and penalties which they have incurred, upon payment of legal costs, and that on all other cases of the petitioners a recovery of the forfeitures and penalties ought to be enforced.”

Mr. RHEA's amendments, and afterwards Mr. CLAY's motion, were negatived by large majorities.

Mr. HALL then offered a resolution declaring that the law ought to be rigidly enforced; which motion also was negatived, seventeen members only rising in favor of it.

The Committee then rose and reported their disagreement to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, without having come to any other determination.

MONDAY, December 14.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the resolution expressive of the sense of the House on the subject of the capture of the Guerriere by the United States frigate Constitution, was recommended to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with a view to incorporate therewith the cases of capture of the Frolic and Macedonian, referred to their consideration on Friday last.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The SPEAKER announced the order of the day on the report of the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of the merchants' bonds.

Mr. BACON, after advertising to the bill before the Senate, which would probably in a day or two place the subject now under consideration more definitely before the House, moved to postpone the further consideration of the report to Wednesday.

Mr. BIBB opposed the motion. He said that the decision of the House on the report now before them would not preclude them from again acting on the subject, if brought before them in any other form.

The motion to postpone the report was negatived—54 to 46.

The question then recurred on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. NEWTON said the subject under consideration, in his opinion, occupied but little space; and that he should, in the observations he had to offer, be as concise as possible. To keep within the rule which he had laid down for his observance, he should avoid entering into an examination and comparison of invoices; nor should he inquire what were the profits or losses, which the merchants had made or suffered. With due deference for the opinions of other gentlemen, he could not perceive the bearing such subjects had on the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. That resolution recommends to the House a plain course, not to legislate on the cases of the merchants. Mr. N. thought the report stood on firm grounds. I am, said Mr. N., of opinion that as the law has provided a proper tribunal for the decision of such cases, they should be left to the ordinary course of law. This opinion was the result of conviction on an investigation of the subject. I find that the law which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to mitigate or remit forfeitures, penalties, &c., incurred in certain cases, passed the 3d of March, 1797, under the Administration of the illustrious WASH-INGTON: that, under the Administration of Mr. ADAMS, it was made perpetual; and that it has, to this day, without any modification whatever, continued in operation. The power of mitigating or remitting forfeitures and penalties incurred under the law regulating the collection of duties on imports and tonnage; under the law laying an embargo, and the supplemental acts when in force; under the late non-intercourse law; and under the present non-importation act; has been constantly exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury. For sixteen years this power has been exercised by the different Secretaries of the Treasury Department, without any complaint; even the merchants during that period of time have acquiesced in the exercise of it, without ever uttering the feeblest note of dissatisfaction; and the members of Congress never attempted, until the present session, to take from the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury a solitary case. During the period of sixteen years the different Secretaries have decided on cases, in which forfeitures and penalties have been incurred, amounting, as to the value of the property, to about fifty millions of dollars. Individual cases of forfeitures, during that period, not unfrequently occurring, as to the value of the property, equal to any case in the class of cases now under consideration. The investiture of this extraordinary, equitable jurisdiction, in the Secretary of the Treasury, was designed by the National Legislature to prevent—despatch being an all-important consideration in the decision of mercantile and revenue cases—that delay in the proceedings of the courts, too often and too justly complained of. The courts, jealous of encroachments of their jurisdictions, have never considered the power of mitigating or remitting forfeitures, &c., as being unconstitutionally invested in the Secretary of the Treasury. They have uniformly, in prosecutions pending before them, for forfeitures, &c., incurred, received the releases of those forfeitures executed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as legal acts, have directed them to be read and entered of record, and have ordered the prosecutions to be forthwith dismissed. This view which I have taken, said Mr. N., of the subject under consideration, proves to the satisfaction of my mind that the power of mitigating or remitting forfeitures, &c., is a power legally belonging to the Secretary of the Treasury. I am not a little astonished to see an effort made to wrest from the Secretary of the Treasury the power which the law has conferred on him, to take cognizance of the cases which have arisen under the non-importation act. Different grounds have been taken by different gentlemen; some objections have been made to the reference of the cases now before the House to the Secretary of the Treasury, on the ground that the law does not give any jurisdiction over them. This position, I think, is not tenable.

The argument of my ingenious friend (Mr. BIBB) is, according to my apprehension, not only sound but conclusive.

The law declares "that the Secretary of the ' Treasury shall have power to mitigate or remit such fine, forfeiture, or penalty, or remove such disability or any part thereof, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same.'

My friend (Mr. BABB) very justly contended, in his exposition of the law, that no limits are assigned to the exercise of a sound discretion, by the Secretary of the Treasury, over forfeitures incurred, except such as the acts of the parties concerned may have assigned to it. If it be apparent that persons have incurred forfeitures through wilful negligence, or by a clear and manifest commission of fraud, the Secretary cannot grant relief. But if forfeitures be incurred through omissions or mistakes, in which not the slightest shade of fraud is visible, or from circumstances not foreseen and in their nature unavoidable, the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to extend relief has no limitations. Another answer to the objections already stated, and in itself conclusive, is, that the non-importation act gives the Secretary of the Treasury the same power over forfeitures under that law, that he has over forfeitures incurred under the law regulating the collection of duties on imposts and tonnage. I like to see, said Mr. N., stability in whatever appertains to jurisprudence. The standard of justice should, at all times, be the same; it should not vary according to circumstances. The same measure should be meted alike to all, high and low, rich and poor. Unless this rule be observed and inflexibly adhered to, a Republican Government loses one of its best characteristics, that of being a just guardian of the rights of the citizens. The rich and magnificent, by a relaxation of the principles which ought to be invariably observed in the dispensation of justice, would have the certainty of impunity for all their acts; their oppressions of the laborious classes of society would be without limitation or restraint; and although the legal forms of prosecutions may be preserved, yet against such offenders the trial would end in a mockery of everything like substantial justice. My friend (Mr. CHEVES) has said that the reference of the cases of the merchants to the Secretary of the Treasury would be highly improper; that it would be striking at the foundation of the Government to refer such matters to that officer; and that it would be taking the cases from the cognizance of the proper tribunals. To these objections I answer that the tribunals of law are open to the parties, they have it in their choice to go into the courts for redress, and even pending the actions at law to apply to the Treasury for a mitigation or remission of the forfeitures incurred. Should he refuse to mitigate or remit the forfeitures which have been incurred under the non-importation act, the cases of the merchants would then be, in the last resort, decided by the judiciary. If the course of procedure recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, be levelling a fatal blow at the principles of a Republican Government, I hesitate not to say that the blow has, long since, been struck, and that the Government has survived it, and is flourishing in health and vigor. The reference of cases every way similar to these, now before the House, to the Secretary of the Treasury, under the successive Administrations of a Washington, of an Adams, of a Jefferson, and of a Madison, prove clearly to my mind, that no dangerous consequences can possibly ensue by giving to the present cases the same direction. I cannot, said Mr. N., persuade myself that these Executive Magistrates, that Congress, and that the people, the intelligent people of the United States, would have so long acquiesced in suffering a law to exist, to be every day in action, which should threaten the subversion of the Government.

The most fatal blow that could be struck at a Republican Government would be that which should destroy the principles which insure a correct and impartial administration of justice. The principles of impartial justice will never sanction a practice, which, while it subjects the poorer classes of society to the rigorous application of the penal laws, allows relaxations and suspensions of those laws in favor of those classes whose prospects are prosperous and splendid.

Whenever discriminations take place in the distribution of justice, the Republic is demolished. I am, sir, in favor of giving to all parties, be their circumstances prosperous or adverse, the like remedy, the same redress. If equal justice be rendered to all persons, this vital and animating principle of a Republican Government will preserve to it vigor and duration, and insure to the Administration thereof the affections of the people. Opinion, sir, in a popular Government, is a desideratum of much moment. Let us not forfeit its support by a departure from those principles which it delights to honor and to cherish. Opinion carefully nurtured is political strength.

To the Constitution it will give stability; to the magisterial arm, nerve; to the laws, energy; and to the execution of them, promptitude and certainty.

I am therefore, for these reasons, unwilling to withdraw the cases of the merchants, which have arisen under the non-importation act, from the direction which the law has given them.

I am not, sir, alarmed for the issue; I am fully persuaded that every mitigating circumstance will receive due attention and consideration, and that such a decision will be made as shall comport with the public good—such a decision as the most refined and enlightened equity can dictate.

The debate on the resolution before the House, has been extended to other subjects, supposed to have some connexion with it. As the part which I have taken, however humble it may have been, in bringing those subjects to notice, has been honored with some attention, and has given rise to some remarks, I feel myself bound to vindicate the opinions which I expressed in support of the proposition which did not originate with me, as well as that of which I was the mover.

Soon after the commencement of the present session, my friend (Mr. HARPER) moved a resolution, directing the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the policy and expediency of prohibiting the exportation of provisions. Some time after the decision of the House on that resolution, which expired at the instant of its birth, I did myself the honor of presenting a resolution, which is still reposing on the table, directing the same committee to institute an inquiry into the expediency of restraining under certain conditions the exportation in vessels belonging to nations in amity with the United States of provision and all such articles as came under the denomination of military stores, and which might be considered as useful and necessary for naval equipments. These resolutions were, by my friend (Mr. CHEVES,) for whose intelligence and patriotic worth I entertain a sincere respect and esteem, compared to a comet with a long tail, alarming and threatening the nation with calamities and afflictions dire. The enlightened citizens, sir, of these United States are not to be dismayed or terrified at real disasters, much less is it to be apprehended that the equanimity of their minds will be disturbed by the appearance of such signs and portents as have of late been visible in the political horizon. To the revival of letters and the arts, man owes his regeneration—enlightened by their cultivation, he feels with pride his liberation from the dominion of ignorance and superstition. No longer does he tremble or quake with fear at the predictions of augurs, or the infuriate ravings of a Parish or an Osgood. He cares not now, whether sacred chickens feed kindly or not; nor does he deign to look whether the crows in their flight take a direction to the East or to the West.

H. OF R.

For the pious, modest and meek expositors of the Gospel, he feels awe, reverence, and love; their examples illustrate and give force to their precepts; and they are justly viewed as the benefactors of the human race. But for the apostles of anarchy and civil war, enlightened and civilized man feels unutterable contempt—apostles who prostitute and pollute the altars of the just and living God, to promote the low and petty purposes of ambition: such apostles are not of the right stock; they are of the stock of Judas Iscariot, and like him are ready to betray their Saviour and their country. In the acquisition of wisdom, man finds an accurate standard, according to which he forms a just appreciation of the things of this world; in the exercise of fortitude, a refuge from the calamities and adversities of this life; and in his courage—when his conscience does not pronounce him a criminal—a shield!

Taking, sir, a different view of the state of public affairs, from that taken by my worthy friend, (Mr. CHEVES,) I am apprehensive, that the resolutions, which he compared to a comet foreboding ill, have disappeared from the horizon too soon for the speedy restoration of peace and the future prosperity of this nation.

The calamities and afflictions which those resolutions portended, and with which they were supposed to be fraught, would have fallen on the heads of our enemies and oppressors. I wish to God I was endued with the power of creating a comet—that I was potent enough to give it impetus and to direct its course. The prostrate nations of the earth should rise and greet it as the sign of their deliverance. Warmed and enlivened by its rays, joy and prosperity should again gladden those regions which ambition and the insatiate spirit of mercantile monopolies have despoiled of their wealth, and deluged with the blood of their unoffending people. The plaintive cries of misery no more should agonize the heart. No more should tears bedew the pallid cheeks of the widow or the orphan. No more should ruthless and savage war and piracy roam over earth and seas in quest of victims—in every direction spreading devastation and ruin.

Anthems and songs should announce the return and restoration of the empire of peace. Man should be permitted to manage, in his own way, his own concerns. Without care he should sow and reap, with a countenance speaking gratitude, the harvest of his labor. These, sir, are the blessings that a comet, of my creation, should dispense.

In the smiles of nations I should feel the conscious luxury of doing good.

But, sir, let me not presume to claim the praise of originality for resolutions which my worthy friend (Mr. CHEVES) compared to a comet—justice and truth forbid it—to wiser heads the invention is due. Signs and portents, like these, are coeval with the independence of this nation. The throes which gave birth to the Revolution of America—to liberty, exiled from every region of the globe, an asylum—and to an oppressed and insulted people, freedom—the same throes gave existence also to such legislative acts as have been dignified with the appellation of comets. The Revolutionary Congress, composed of men, I ought to have said a galaxy of worthies and patriots, such as the astonished and admiring world never before saw—worthies whose wisdom and valor fitted them to be the saviours and deliverers of a young people, from the blighting oppression of an Egyptian bondage—those worthies, at that new and eventful era, did not disdain to create such legislative comets, and make them efficient orbs of their political system.

Did not those illustrious statesmen recommend the non-importation and non-consumption of British manufactures—at a time, too, when the supplies of the American people were drawn wholly from Great Britain—at a time when the nation could boast of no established manufactories—when the nation was destitute of military resources, and when war was raging—and even at a time when the Treasury of the Union had not a dollar at command. At that eventful and ever memorable period of our history, Congress recommended, for the power of coercion did not belong to Congress, the non-importation and non-consumption of British manufactures—the people heard the voice of Congress, and with cheerfulness and alacrity obeyed it. Like men inspired with a high and dignified sense of national rights and national honor, they magnanimously suffered in their country's cause every privation.

Can I err, sir, is it possible for me to err, when for my polar star I follow such illustrious examples of wisdom and patriotism?

My friend (Mr. CHEVES) has expressed with warmth and energy his opposition to the non-importation act, and to every sort of restriction. He considers the non-importation act a system of self-torture, producing, by its paralyzing effects, in our cities, a gloomy stillness, such as that which is produced by the visitation of a pestilence. Such a description, deriving no little advantage from the graces of elocution, would naturally fill the mind with apprehensions, and infuse into it a belief that nature herself was brought to an awful pause, the aspect of things portending dissolution—"the wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds!"

Recovering from the despondency into which I was thrown by the animated speech of my friend, I was pleased beyond description to behold so many cheerful countenances, so many unequivocal signs of content, self-complacency, and composure.

As our Eastern brethren are the bitterest enemies that the non-importation act has, as their lamentations have been loud and incessant since the first restrictive measure was adopted, my imagination has been constantly picturing the effect which real and corroding grief, long suffered, would have on their minds and bodies. I was tremblingly alive for their temporal happiness. I expected to see them pale, emaciated, mere moving skeletons—a bare-bones Parliament. But how agreeably am I disappointed! the reverse of this picture is the true representation. From the constant exercise which they have been taking on the electioneering hobby-horse, the restrictive system, they have grown sleek, ruddy, and robust, so plethoric that the skilful physician, if consulted, would without doubt recommend either abstinence or depletion.

The power of imagination improperly exercised, or artificially stimulated, brings, on individuals as well as on bodies politic, evils which are incalculably mischievous.

But to the point. The observations of my friend (Mr. CHEVES) have constrained me, contrary to my wish, to take a concise view of the causes which have depressed commerce. I trust I shall be enabled to show that the depression of our commerce is not fairly attributable to the operation of the restrictive system, nor to any other act of the Government of the United States. A plain succinct statement of historic facts, will place this subject in its proper light.

When Great Britain in the year 1793 took the attitude of a belligerent Power opposed to France, her commerce became of course circumscribed. The United States continuing neutral, had opened to them a more extensive trade than that which they had heretofore enjoyed. The expectation of enjoying the advantages of a neutral position was not in all instances realized. The British Government, intending to starve the new Republic of France into a compliance with its views, prohibited the exportation of provisions to that country. That Government succeeded in instigating the Russian and other Governments to pursue the same policy. American vessels performing their voyages to France were by the orders of the British Government captured and carried into British ports and those of her allies, thereby depriving the United States of the best market, which was France, for the sale of their productions. The events of the war changing the relative state of the nations of Europe as to each other, Spain, Holland, and other Powers, successively became parties in the war against Great Britain. The change of attitude among the Powers of the Continent, heretofore supplied by the British with their manufactures in their own bottoms, opened a trade to the United States in every respect extensive and lucrative. Our merchants availed themselves of it, but the embarrassments it had to encounter were great, as the British Government pretended that, according to the rule which that Government had adopted in the year 1756, neutral vessels were liable to capture if they were engaged in carrying on a trade from the colonies directly to the mother country, and from the mother country directly to the colonies. In other words, that a trade not allowed in peace could not be prosecuted during war. This declaration was made in direct contravention to the practices of that Government, which never fails to relax the rigor of the navigation acts during war, to procure through neutrals from the enemies' country articles necessary for their manufactures. This conduct of the British Government caused the capture and condemnation of many American vessels and cargoes. The Government of the United States protested against this procedure; negotiations were resorted to, explanations took place, and the British Government at last conceded that the right belonged to the United States, as a neutral Power, to import into the United States the produce of enemies' colonies, and to re-export the same to the mother country, and also to import into the United States the manufactures of the mother country—and to re-export the same to the colonies. This trade was lucrative, it gave activity to commerce, and immense profits to the American merchants. They supplied the most wealthy nations of the Continent of Europe with the productions of the West India islands and South America, and also with the costly manufactures of the East Indies.

The colonies of France and Spain were supplied with whatever they required by the merchants of the United States. The British Government did not foresee the effect this concession to justice and neutral enterprise would produce. The moment it discovered the great advantages arising from the concession, then its jealous and selfish policy became alarmed. As a rival, this nation is treated and dreaded. If opportunities do not spontaneously occur, they are artificially produced, to justify acts with no other object in view, but to contract or to circumscribe within the narrowest compass the commerce of the United States. To do away all advantages accruing to the United States from the concessions alluded to, the British Government, fruitful in devices, but not always successful in concealing the injustice they are designed to sanction, pretended that the trade from the United States in the productions of enemies' colonies, could not be considered in any other light, than a direct voyage (making a deviation to save appearances) from the enemies' colonies to the United States, and from thence to the mother country. This change of policy, unworthy of an honest and enlightened Government, was made in violation of the concession already mentioned, and which had been officially notified to Mr. King, our Minister at the Court of London, as a concession made with deliberation by the British Government. When the British cabinet altered its views, in respect to neutral trade, the merchants of the United States had afloat on the ocean merchandise to an immense amount. This property, in pursuance of British orders, was captured by British cruisers and condemned by British courts of admiralty. The Berlin decree of November 1806, was issued to retaliate on the British Government, for the blockade which that Government had ordered of all the coast and ports from the river Elbe to Brest inclusive, in the early part of the year 1806. The British Order in Council of November, 1806, was issued in retaliation for the Berlin decree, and the Milan decree of the 21st of December, 1807, was issued in retaliation for the Orders in Council.

These orders and decrees put on neutral commerce a seal; the execution of them proved fatal to the American trade. Is trade, foreign trade, at a stand? Does a gloomy stillness prevail in our cities? Is the merchant disconsolate? If these misfortunes have fallen to our lot, the sources of them are to be found in the atrocious policy of the belligerent Powers towards neutral nations, particularly towards the United States of America. In the acts of foreign Governments just enumerated, are to be found the instruments for torturing commerce—instruments which have pierced it to its vitals. I ask, with what region of the earth can trade be prosecuted with any prospect of success, or to any advantage? I boldly assert, for years past, with no nation on the globe.

We cannot, sir, justly appreciate the lot of this nation but by comparing it with that which has fallen to other nations. If an Atheist, who ascribes all things to the production of a blind fatality, were to take a view of the situation and condition of every State and Empire, and make a just estimate of the faculties and facilities of each, in administering to the happiness of man; on the one hand he would behold Asia and Africa, and Europe, and the countries subjected to the domination of Europe, afflicted with calamities and miseries seldom suffered, and never before surpassed; on the other he would behold the United States of America, though suffering severely from the war raging in Europe, under the auspices of a Government that consults better than any political institution ever known or extant, the happiness of man; agriculture flourishing—a country abounding in everything that can promote ease and comfort—manufactures springing up and furnishing articles which but the other day were imported solely from foreign countries—their capacity for furnishing supplies daily enlarging and extending; the raw materials essential to keep them in operation the products of the land, and new resources explored and constantly increasing the means of internal prosperity and national force and energy. These multiplied advantages, enjoyed by no nation but this, would strike his mind with force, and liberate it as by a charm from the contraction of prejudices and pre-conceived errors. Under the influence of new and enlightened impressions, he would abandon his creed of a blind fatality, and acknowledge that the beneficent providence of God presides over the destinies of this nation.

Oh fortunate people, if you but knew your happy lot!

The American Government, anxious to succor the suffering merchants, and instigated by them to obtain redress for the wrongs they had suffered and were suffering, commenced a system of restrictive measures on the commerce of Great Britain and France.

The history of the various restrictive measures adopted by Congress, and the manner in which their efficacy have been defeated, is too well known to require elucidation. Have the restrictive measures failed?

If they have, of the complete effect intended to be produced, let the opposition marshalled against them in the East answer for the consequences of their failure. Had one mind actuated the citizens of the United States, those measures would have insured to this nation peace, and the fruition of all the blessings flowing from it. The restrictive system failing, from the causes mentioned, war was resorted to with reluctance, as the last sad alternative; a state of things forced on the national Government from the want of union. The non-importation act, although it has had every disadvantage, every difficulty to encounter, has produced a sensation through the British Empire, never before felt. The merchants and manufacturers of Great Britain are in a condition less to be envied than that of any other people. To them the prospective is gloomy beyond conception. I will not go further into this subject. You, sir, (Mr. CLAY, the Speaker,) have, in a strain of impressive eloquence, shown the distresses of that nation. The evidence delivered to the House of Commons proves beyond doubt how much the merchants and manufacturers have suffered by its operation.

You have done ample justice to the subject. My humble aid is not required to sustain the character of the non-importation act, or the efficacy of that and other restrictive measures, when in you they have found an Atlas.

With you, sir, (Mr. CLAY, the Speaker,) I had the satisfaction of agreeing in opinion, as to the efficacy of the despised non-importation act, and also as to the necessity of continuing it in operation as a measure very injurious to the enemy. It is with no little regret that I find you opposed at this time, to an embargo, principally for this reason, that an embargo would prevent the importation into the United States of specie from Great Britain, through Spain and Portugal. The manner in which you supported this position was ingenious and specious—the theory has elegance and symmetry, but I am apprehensive it will in no respect be found susceptible of execution.

Permit me to examine, to analyze the position; to explore the resources of the British Empire.

No objection is entertained against an embargo, but the prevention it would interpose to the importation of specie. You observed, that Great Britain would be compelled to maintain an army in the Peninsula, and that this object could no ways be effected but by purchasing provisions, with specie, of the Americans.

I entertain, with due deference, the opinion that Great Britain cannot furnish the specie. My reasons in support of this opinion are derived from the condition of that country. The resources of the British Empire depend on commerce. When trade flourished, the precious metals were drawn from a thousand sources, and were to be found there in great abundance; but the duration of the war, in which that Empire has been and is still engaged, has produced such a mutability in human affairs, so many revolutions in the actual and relative state of nations, in respect to each other, that commerce at this day has no activity, nor can it flourish and acquire the necessary momentum, while the belligerent Powers, disagreeing in everything, agree in the proscription of every principle on which the support of it depends. The commerce of the world is reduced almost to a mathematical point. The clamors and afflictive cries of British manufacturers and merchants are heard in this hemisphere. The precious metals, we are told, have nearly vanished from Great Britain; and the paper medium, the substitute for them, has depreciated so much, that a guinea is equal in value to one pound ten shillings in paper currency. Gloomy as things appear, the prospective is still worse. The commerce of the British Empire is rapidly sinking to the last point of depression.

The armament which was sent some years ago to the island of Walcheren, was designed to have been employed, if accounts be credited, at a distant point on the continent of Europe, to the north of Walcheren; but that object could not be effected for the want of specie, to furnish it with necessary supplies.

Since that expedition, the face of things has changed, greatly for the worse; nor is it within the ken of man to say when the adverse tide in human affairs will slack, will stop, and when again it will take a prosperous turn. This picture, sir, is not too highly colored—it exhibits a dreary prospect of getting money, for the wheat and flour of the United States, from Great Britain.

I will now, sir, for the sake of argument, admit that the British Government has the command of specie; and yet I will be so bold, in the very teeth of this admission, as to contend that the chance of getting it will be no better than it is at present. The British Government may permit the grain and flour of the United States to be imported into Spain and Portugal in American vessels; but it will never suffer them to export from those countries specie, during the existence of war. The only effect which this trade will produce, is to nurture discontent and disquietude. The merchants, instead of receiving specie, will be obliged to take bills on the Government of Great Britain. They must take bills or nothing. These bills are to be paid in Great Britain. The consequence will be that the merchants will have the amount of their cargoes locked up there, as the war interdicts all trade with the British Empire. The want of those funds, or the apprehension that they may lose them, by the happening of some inauspicious event, which is within the chances of a fair calculation, will produce much dissatisfaction against and opposition to the Government.

I cannot, with all the deliberation I have given to this subject, discern the wisdom of that policy which makes it the interest of men to obstruct the progress of the Government, while asserting and maintaining the national rights. Nor can I perceive the wealth to be derived from a trade to the Peninsula. On the contrary, it is in my opinion a losing trade. No return cargoes are received. The capital of this country is employed to supply the enemy. The merchant, from his own funds, or the money he obtains on loan from the banks, purchases provisions which are exported to Spain and Portugal, and which are sold for bills on the British Government. The money for these bills cannot be obtained, and the war prevents the purchase of British manufactures with the bills. In the manner in which this trade is carried on, the enemy may be said to obtain a beneficial credit from our merchants. This trade places the British Government, although the debtor, upon better ground than the American merchant, inasmuch as it has the power of confiscating the bills as enemies' property, if it chooses so to do. But, sir, all our hopes are visionary, if an expectation be indulged that American vessels will be employed in this intercourse. This trade will be carried on, not in American, but British bottoms, under cover of the Swedish, Spanish, and Portuguese flags. The navigation of Great Britain profits by this order of things. The war gives it security.

I will now take, if I may be allowed the expression, a birds-eye view of Spain and Portugal, and of the commercial harvest, if any, that can be gathered or gleaned in those regions. Spain is the theatre of a war, marked with all the characteristics of cruelty, and devastation, and ruin. The greatest disorder and confusion prevail in that country; the Government, if it has one, can boast of no energy; and no temptation whatever is held out to commercial enterprise. The revolution which is progressing in South America will terminate, and God grant it, in the independence of that country; the consequences are evident. The streams which, flowing from Peruvian and Mexican sources, have heretofore poured into the bosom of Spain golden treasures, are returning to their natural channels. The agriculture and commerce of those rich, extensive, and fertile regions, will acquire by this flow of things, in the course which nature herself ordains, renovated life, activity, and vigor.

The war has reduced Portugal to a condition equally deplorable with that of Spain. In herself, Portugal has no resources. To Brazil, Portugal looks in vain for succors. The Court of Brazil, destitute of the knowledge of political economy, and of method and sagacity in its fiscal operations, finds the resources of that country incommensurate to its wants. It would be a happy circumstance, if the misfortunes of the kingdom of Brazil originated in the want of enlightened policy in the Government; the hope and expectation of reformation in the abuses of the Government might prevent the despair and despondency of the nation. This consolation is not for them to indulge. On that ill-fated country, British influence and intrigue have shed their maledictions; the throne totters, and the spirit of disaffection and disorganization threatens its total subversion. Thus, sir, I have shown, after my manner, that the merchants of the United States cannot cherish even a hope of receiving specie, at the markets of Spain and Portugal, for the productions of this country, either from the Spaniards or Portuguese, or from the agents of the British Government. This commerce is therefore productive of no advantage. It is detrimental, inasmuch as it contributes greatly to the relief of the enemy.

It enables him to wage war with less expense, and renders his means of annoyance much greater than they would be with it. To increase, to double the expenditures of the British Government at this time, when its resources by the loss or circumscription of the trade of the British Empire have been greatly diminished, and are daily diminishing, would soon bring to a successful termination the war we are compelled to wage for national rights and privileges. From the present condition of trade, an embargo, in my opinion, could produce no injury to this country, but on the contrary would be the strongest measure that Congress could adopt to give energy and effect to the war. The state of the British Empire is such as to make it a measure, in whatever light it may be viewed, well adapted to increase and multiply the difficulties and pressures which the enemy has to contend with. Foreign supplies of grain are required for the support of a numerous population, and which necessary article can at this time be furnished by no other nation than this. To make this clear and evident, I beg leave to read a passage from a late English author of great celebrity. Malthus, on Population, makes the following pointed, impressive, and judicious observations:

"That we can readily turn ourselves from an importing to an exporting nation, in the article of corn, I would by no means pretend to say; but both theory and the experience of the first half of the last century warrant us in concluding it practicable, and we cannot but allow that it is worth the experiment, as the permanence of our national prosperity may depend upon it. If we proceed in our present course, let us but for a moment reflect on the probable consequences. We can hardly doubt that in the course of some years we shall draw from America and the nations bordering on the Baltic, as much as two millions of quarters of wheat, besides other corn, the support of above two millions of people. If, under these circumstances, any commercial discussion or other dispute, were to arise with these nations, with what a weight of power they would negotiate! Not the whole of the British navy could offer a more convincing argument than the simple threat of shutting all their ports. I am not unaware that in general we may securely depend upon people's not acting directly contrary to their interest. But this consideration, all powerful as it is, will sometimes yield voluntarily to national indignation, and is sometimes forced to yield to the resentment of a sovereign. It is of sufficient weight in practice when applied to manufactures; because a delay in their sale is not of such consequence, and from their smaller bulk they are easily smuggled. But, in the case of corn, a delay of three or four months may produce the most complicated misery; and, from the great bulk of corn, it will generally be in the power of a sovereign to execute almost completely his resentful purpose. Small commercial States which depend nearly for the whole of their supplies on foreign Powers will always have many friends. They are not of sufficient consequence to excite any general indignation against them, and if they cannot be supplied from one quarter, they will from another. But, this is by no means the case with such a country as Great Britain, whose commercial ambition is peculiarly calculated to excite a general jealousy, and, in fact, has excited it to a very great degree.

"If our commerce continue increasing for a few years, and our commercial population with it, we shall be laid so bare to the shafts of fortune that nothing but a miracle can save us from being struck. The periodical return of such seasons of dearth, as those which we have of late experienced, I consider as absolutely certain, upon our present importing system; but, excluding from the question at present the dreadful distress that they occasion, which, however, no man of humanity can long banish from his mind, I would ask, if it is politic, merely with a view to our national greatness, to render ourselves thus dependent upon others for our support, and put it in the power of a combination against us, to diminish our population two millions."

These observations, enforced as they are by weighty and strong reasons, render it unnecessary for me to make a single comment. They are replete with good sense; they are the result of deep reflection. Who will venture to say that the time for that verification and fulfilment has not arrived? If a peace, speedy and honorable to this nation, be an object of desirable attainment, it cannot, I will boldly assert, be obtained but by a vigorous prosecution of the war. The whole strength of the nation should be put forth. It is the wisest policy so to act. It will not only prevent the effusion of much blood, but it will be found to comport best with a regard to economy, in the expenditure of the public treasure. No measure within the compass of Congressional powers, if my judgment be correct, and it is supported by able authority, is so likely to give the requisite vigor to the war, and thereby bring it to a happy termination, as that of an embargo. I have deemed it proper, in justice to myself, to make these observations. I have not taken this stand, I trust, for reasons light and trivial. I could enlarge on this subject, but I will not trespass longer on your patience and politeness. I may err; I am sensible of my frailties and weakness; but, in sustaining this opinion, I am persuaded you will allow me the credit of acting in obedience to my conviction and sober judgment.

Mr. BRIGHAM said: Mr. Speaker, the subject of the merchants' bonds, now under consideration, is of serious consequence, and has been ably discussed. It is a question of great magnitude, and involves the rights and the interests of a respectable and intelligent class of our fellow-citizens, who have as much reputation for their industry and integrity as any other class in the community.

But the honorable Committee of Ways and Means have reported to the House that it is inexpedient to legislate on the subject, and that it should be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sir, this is a subject of too much importance to be submitted to the decision of any one individual. The question is now before the proper tribunal, and it is incumbent on this House to decide; we have a duty to perform, and I hope that the House will have the satisfaction resulting from a conscientious discharge of it.

Mr. B. said that the chief duty and cause of all Governments was to protect the rights of property; that personal security was the prime inducement for men to institute civil Government; that our Constitution provides expressly for the protection of person and property, and we are sworn to support the Constitution; and, in his opinion, the House were as much bound, and by as high solemnity, to decide in this case, and to decide correctly, as ever a jury of the country, in a court of law, were holden to do justice between party and party.

Mr. B. said that he had heard no satisfactory reason offered, why this House should avoid this question and throw the responsibility on the Secretary of the Treasury. Could he better distinguish between right and wrong; between justice and injustice, than this House? It will not be admitted.

Sir, said Mr. B., we are the confidants of our constituents, and we ought to protect them in their rights, and to convince them by our acts of justice toward them, that we are worthy of their confidence; and make it manifest to the world that we are really and practically, what we are nominally, an intelligent, a just, and a deliberate body; a terror only to evil-doers; and that we punish none but the guilty, and those who deserve it.

Sir, this is a question of property. The real question is, whether the goods, that are bonded, are the property of the Government or the property of those individual merchants, by whose labor and enterprise and at whose expense they were imported?

Sir, the Government claim this property under the operation of the non-importation law, and their claim can arise on no other ground; and, to make out their case, they allege that the importers of these goods have violated this law, and forfeited the property into the hands of the Government; and we are to say whether they are guilty or not guilty. Before we decide on this question, let us examine into the transaction and into the authority under which the merchants believed they were acting, and also into the provisions and character of the non-importation law.

Mr. B. said the non-importation law was introduced and enforced as a retaliatory measure, to retaliate on the British Government for her obnoxious Orders in Council, and was intended to be coextensive with those orders, and when those orders ceased to operate, the demands of these laws were satisfied, and no longer to be in force. This appears from the special provision which was made, authorizing the President, on the event of the revocation of the Orders in Council, to issue his proclamation declaring the fact, and to set aside the operation of the law.

Mr. B. said that he had supposed it was the duty of the President, on receiving official information of the revocation of the Orders in Council, to have issued his proclamation, and to have exercised the power vested in him without delay. The merchants considered the power delegated to the President, as a pledge of the repeal of the non-importation law, whenever those Orders in Council should be revoked; and they justly supposed that they might with safety ship their goods.

Sir, said Mr. B., this is not all; these merchants have other public record evidence that this law would be repealed on the revocation of those orders. The Secretary of State, July 20, 1811, in his correspondence of that date with Mr. Foster, the British Minister, states expressly, "that it was in the power of the British Government, by one single act of justice, to enable the President of the United States to set aside the operation of the non-importation law;" and he told Mr. Foster what this act of justice was, namely, that if the British Government would cease to violate our neutral rights, by revoking her Orders in Council, the President alone had the power; and the Secretary of State said, that he was instructed to inform him that the President would exercise this power without delay, and terminate the non-importation law.

Sir, under these circumstances and with this information, the merchants had a right, on the revocation of the Orders in Council, to believe that they should be safe and justified in shipping their goods from an enemy's country to their own. They were scrupulous and careful not to resist the laws of their Government, and gave no direction to have their goods shipped until those Orders in Council should be revoked, and when they were revoked, they consulted Mr. Russell, our Chargé des Affaires at the Court of Great Britain, who gave them his opinion that it would be safe for them to ship their goods, that no penalties could be demanded under the non-importation law; indeed, he advised them to ship their goods, and carry their property home; and now, shall they be punished for it? What else would they have done, unless they had abandoned their property and left it in the hands of the enemy? There can be nothing wrong in the importers' shipping their goods from an enemy's country.

Mr. B. said that there was no fraud or blame attached to the merchants for shipping their goods; that it was their duty, a duty which they owed to themselves and to their country. He could not understand how the petitioners were guilty of any offence, nor chargeable with anything, but giving their confidence to the Government; to the highest authority of the nation; and certainly that could be no crime, and we should not inflict the penalties of poverty on the innocent. The want of money can give us no claim to this property. The high-sounding sum of twenty millions of dollars may increase the inclination to get it, but never can increase our right to take it.

Mr. B. said, he hoped that the House, on this important question, would be governed by a unanimous and just policy, cancel the merchants' bonds, gain respectability to themselves, and afford comfort and protection to the petitioners.

Mr. QUINCY said, that in listening to the debate, what had impressed his mind the most forcibly was the simplicity of the question. He was less surprised at the arguments which were urged, than that any argument was necessary. A mere statement of the case, he should have thought would have settled the question. Twenty millions of dollars were said to be forfeited to the United States;—an amount equal to one-third of the whole national debt. This sum was alleged to be due, from comparatively a small class of men, in particular sections of the country, in the cities and on the seaboard. It was distributed among the individuals of that class, in various proportions. To every one of them, the amount demanded is material. The greater part of the fortunes of some, is at stake. To others it is a simple question of prosperity or ruin. The principles arising out of the case, and connected with a decision, are in their nature so complicated and delicate, that scarcely two men can be found on the floor of Congress who can agree by what scale remission shall be graduated, if remitted at all. A case of this magnitude, so important to the public, so critical to the individuals, so dubious in point of principle, and so consequential in sectional alarm and interest, it is seriously contended should be referred to the decision of a single individual—that one man should be invested with the power to decide the fates of multitudes of his fellow-citizens, and decree riches or property; not by any known rule or standard, but according to his absolute will and discretion! Such is the power seriously contended for, in a country calling itself free, by men who pretend to understand the nature of civil liberty, and to venerate its principles.

Mr. Q. said, that the nature of the proposition was not more astonishing, than the main reason urged in its support. And this was, that the Secretary of the Treasury possessed this power already; that the law now placed it in his hands. As if the greatness of a power, and its exceeding the trust which any man ought to possess, and its irreconcilableness with the settled principles on which public safety in a free country depends, were not conclusive, either that no such power ever was invested, or that the possessor ought to be deprived of it.

Mr. Q. then proceeded to investigate the general powers vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, for the mitigation, or remission of fines, penalties and forfeitures. He contended that no such power was invested in the Head of that Department, as the Secretary had asserted in his letter to the Committee of Ways and Means. In this letter, the Secretary asserts that—"the power to remit the share of the United States, and of all other persons, in whole or in part, and on such terms and conditions as may be deemed reasonable and just, is by law vested in the Secretary of the Treasury." Mr. Q. said, that this was nothing less than the assertion of an absolute discretion in relation to the subject-matter. A discretion without limit or principle, or measure of control, or rule of decision, except the sovereign will and pleasure of the individual possessing it. For he, who can do in relation to any matter or thing, in the whole or in the part, and fix such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and just, has as absolute an authority, in that matter or thing, as heart can desire. And if by any general law such power be invested in any person whatsoever, we have not much to boast, in this respect, either of the wisdom or of the freedom of our laws.

The question then is, whether this power, thus asserted to exist in himself, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be vested in him by law. Mr. Q. said that he confessed, that on the first reading of the statute, being under the influence of the opinion thus unequivocally expressed by the Secretary, and not at once perceiving how the terms of law had been wrested to the purposes of official construction, he yielded a momentary and reluctant assent to the claim of the Secretary. Recollecting, however, what a fascinating thing absolute power is, and how little implicit faith any man has a right to claim, in a case where the degree of his power is dependent upon his own construction; recollecting, also, the character of the men, who, in the year 1797, when the law in question was passed, had the reins of power, he began to doubt of the construction, and set himself carefully to investigate on what grounds this arbitrary discretion, thus obtrusively asserted by the Secretary as existing in himself, was founded. He said, that the men who, at the time when the law in question was passed, presided over the construction of our laws, were not only learned and able men, and true lovers of their country, but they were men, also, deeply vested in the principles of civil liberty; they were natives of the soil, and had been educated in the arbitrary doctrines of the civil law, but had drank in the essential principles of the ancient Saxon common law, as it were with their mothers' milk. Such men were not likely to grant so enormous a power, by any general terms, even in an unguarded moment. For had reason failed them in a case of this nature, instinct would have come to their aid. He determined, therefore, to investigate this question, aloof from the prejudices which the assertion of the Secretary of the Treasury and the corroborative opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means had created, and set himself to examine what were those essential principles of civil liberty, which lay as it were, at the base of all statutes of this kind, and which were, in their nature, so predominant and inherent, that no friend of freedom could possibly forget them, when framing such a statute.

Mr. Q. said, that on turning this subject in his mind, he had found two principles of the nature which he sought. The first was, that the innocent should never be confounded with the guilty. Of consequence, that the law must have been intended to be so constructed as that, as far as possible, the former should always escape, and the latter should always be punished. The second was, that the object of the penalty was only the enforcement of the provisions of the law. Of consequence, that when this object was attained, there ought to be an end of the penalty which was ever to be considered as the sanction, or vindicatory branch of the law, and never be perverted to the purposes of the ways and means of the Treasury. When the terms of the statute under consideration, were considered in reference to these principles, all doubts as to its true construction vanished. The character of the framers of the law was vindicated. No such power as that asserted by the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the subject of the penalties, was vested in him. On the contrary, the real grant of power was precise, limited, and perfectly consistent with the principles of civil liberty.

The law contained two clauses, which comprehended all the powers relative to this subject vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. The words are these: After prescribing the modes by which testimony concerning the circumstances of the case shall be collected and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, the statute proceeds: "Who shall, thereupon, have power to 'mitigate, or remit such fine, forfeiture, or penalty, or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same; and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued, upon such terms or conditions, as he may deem reasonable and just."

From these clauses in the statute, if from any,

the Secretary of the Treasury derives that unlimited discretion, which he asserts, in his report to the Committee of Ways and Means, to be vested in his department. Now, these clauses are distinct and substantive, having relation to two objects, also distinct and substantive. The first clause relates to the penalty incurred. The second to the prosecution commenced.

As to the first clause, relative to the penalty, fine, or forfeiture incurred, so far from vesting an unlimited discretionary power, it vests, strictly speaking, no discretion whatever. It is, in truth, a power to mitigate, remit, or remove, according to a stated and specified statute standard. This authority is to exercise his judgment, upon the circumstances of the case, touching the existence or non-existence of either of two particulars stated in the statute—wilful negligence, or fraud. If neither exist, he has the power to remit. If either exist, but in a partial degree, he has the power to graduate the penalty, fine or forfeiture, to the degree of guilt. And this is his whole power resulting from this clause. The head of the Treasury is a mere tribunal to decide whether the statute guilt has been incurred, or any part of it, and, according to that judgment, to graduate the fine, penalty, or forfeiture. If there be no guilt, his power of mitigation, that is, of graduation, is at an end. In such case it cannot be exercised. The single authority he has, is to remit altogether. He has no more right to talk of "profits," or "extra profits" or "equivalents," or to intimate boons or "loans," as the grounds of remission, than he has to decree the whole penalty into his own pocket for his private use. The plain purpose of the law is, that guilt should suffer, and that innocence should escape. And by guilt and innocence, is only meant statute guilt, or statute innocence. Whatever is either wilful negligence or fraud, is statute guilt. Whatever is neither one nor the other, is innocence. It is easy to see how perfectly reconcileable this is to the established principles of civil liberty. Instead of a sharp-scented statesman, invested with powers to hunt among fines, penalties, and forfeitures, for the ways and means of the Treasury, we find only a benignant and wisely constituted tribunal, with power to judge upon the circumstances of the case, how far any statute guilt has been incurred, and to graduate suffering, according to the degree which shall appear.

As to the second clause, relative to the prosecution commenced, there is, indeed, a discretion invested in the head of the Treasury; but it is a discretion extremely limited in its nature, arising out of the necessity of the case, extending only to very subordinate considerations, and in exercise of which there is little or no temptation to abuse. It relates only to the terms and conditions on which he may direct the prosecution to cease. These he is permitted to fix "as he may deem reasonable and just." That such a power is necessary is obvious, because, although the innocent has a right to be free from the imputation and penalty of guilt, yet the costs and expenses which have been incurred is a loss, which must fall somewhere. The nature of things has thrown it upon him, and no principle of justice can transfer it to another. But the discretionary power here given is, in the nature of things, extremely limited, and extends only to those particulars, which are incident to the prosecution, to costs, expenses, and sometimes compensation to custom-house officers for services rendered, either in their seizure, or in the care of the property. It is obvious, also, that in exercising such a discretion the danger of abuse is limited, not only from the circumscribed nature of the sphere, but from the circumstances in which it is exercised. He has no official inducement to abuse his power. The particulars which are incident to a prosecution are distinct, notorious, and easily to be ascertained; and as to compensation due to the custom-house officer, the Secretary having, by no possibility, any interest, personal or official, in the decision, may safely be intrusted with it; and ought to be, out of regard to the indemnification of the officer. Here, again, there is no interference with the established principles of civil liberty. The question relative to the causing the prosecution to cease, has no connexion with guilt or innocence. It is merely ascertaining the inevitable loss, which he must bear, on whom the bolt of Heaven has fallen. If a compensation is decreed, it is for the custom-house officer, and not the Treasury. It is decreed not as a part of the penalty, for this is incurred only in consequence of guilt, which is in this case out of the question; but is decreed only as part of that inevitable loss, which some one must bear, and of course he on whom the lot is cast.

When the statute is considered, it will easily be seen what are the means by which the Secretary of the Treasury grasps at this unlimited and arbitrary discretion, which he asserts in his letter to the committee. It is by confounding what is distinct, and associating what are separate. By a sort of Treasury amalgam, he consolidates both clauses of the statute into one, and attaches the power of annexing "terms and conditions which he shall deem reasonable and just," to the clause which has relation to the penalty, instead of restricting it to the clause which has relation to the prosecution. This may be a very happy construction for the Treasury, but it is a very ruinous one for the citizen. At least so it is likely to prove, judging by the proposition now under consideration.

If any one asks why these powers are to be construed as though distinct and substantive, instead of amalgamated and consolidated, I answer, on four plain and solid grounds: The terms of the law—the policy of the law—the nature of the thing—and the established principles of civil liberty.

The terms of the law are select and appropriate. Those connected with the remission or mitigation, in whole or in part, not only give the power, but limit the exercise of it, by an express statute standard: He is to do the one or the other, according to the non-existence, or the degree of existence, of "wilful negligence, or intention of fraud." Those connected with the causing the prosecution to cease, are equally precise. The power of annexing terms and conditions, such as he may deem reasonable and just, relates to that object, (the causing of the prosecution to cease,) and nothing else.

The policy of the law is not less corroborative of this construction. It is a remedial statute—as such, it must be construed liberally. Its policy is, to suffer all the innocent, and none of the guilty, to escape. For this purpose, it has set up a statute standard, by which the Secretary is to decide who is innocent, and the degree of innocence, and graduate the penalty accordingly. Therefore it is, that the power of affixing conditions is not annexed by the terms of the law to the power of mitigating and remitting. To the degree of statute guilt which a man has incurred, the Secretary is morally bound to punish. But when of this degree there is none, he is then morally bound to acquit. Of "terms and conditions" here, there is no use. For guilt must be punished according to its degree, and innocence must escape. Now the law permits no "terms or conditions" to be made with the innocent; no "equivalent" is asked for not confounding them with the guilty. It is the policy, it is the delight of the law, that they should go free and unspotted, according to their innate purity.

The nature of the thing shows also that the power of annexing such "terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and just," exclusively belongs to the power of causing the prosecution to cease. For, from the nature of the thing, the question concerning causing the prosecution to cease, is subordinate, in point of importance, and secondary in point of time, to the question concerning mitigating or remitting the penalty. For, whether the decision of the Secretary be, guilty of a part, or not guilty at all, the Secretary's power is in the same state. The degree of guilt or innocence is ascertained. The penalty is remitted, or graduated. The only remaining prerogative of the Secretary relates to the prosecution. Here he possesses the discretion before noticed. But it is a power which, from the nature of the thing, cannot retract, and bring again innocence or guilt into view. That is already settled, at least in principle, and must be, before the question concerning the prosecution can be agitated.

But there is a stronger argument than all these, resulting from the established principles of civil liberty. What is the nature of that proud consciousness, which freemen feel and delight to acknowledge; and of what stuff is it composed? What is it, but the certainty, with which each individual is inspired, that he holds life, liberty, and property, subject only to known laws, and aloof from the will of any individual? So long as he is innocent, he has no compromise to make, no equivalent to offer, no truckling to assume. He, on whom any fine, penalty, or forfeiture of the collection law has fallen, by any mischance or by the act of God, has as much right to possess this consciousness as the proudest mortal of us all. He stands before the tribunal of the Secretary, not to chaffer for a pardon. He is innocent. If there be any portion of the statute guilt, graduate the punishment; but if there be none, cruel, wicked, despotic is that construction, which obliges him to compound for his escape, from a statute framed only to punish guilt; to pay "profits;" to make "forced loans;" to promise "equivalents!" For what? Why, truly that, though innocent, he should not partake the fate of guilt.

When I speak of innocence and guilt, I mean always statute innocence, or statute guilt. I have nothing to do with the money dreams of the Secretary of the Treasury, nor with the day dreams of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) He did not pretend, no man has pretended, no man can pretend, that there was any intention of fraud, or any wilful negligence in the merchants, whose case is now before the House. But he told us at one time, that their crime consisted "in purchasing in Great Britain;" at another, that it consisted "in not co-operating with the policy of the American Government." Grant, for argument sake, all the guilt these charges include: Is that wilful negligence, or intention of fraud? Free of this, are they not innocent? Innocent, are they not entitled to entire remission?

This construction, for which I contend, I think I can safely state, is conformable to the practice of the Treasury, antecedent to the accession of the present Secretary. At least so it appears from the book of abstracts of the Treasury, entirely to my satisfaction. Yet, upon this point, I would not be considered as expressing myself with absolute certainty, as I have not had an opportunity to examine the original records of the cases, nor yet to converse with the Secretary of the Treasury, although I have been twice at his office for that purpose. The abstracts of the Treasury, antecedent to that period, do not indicate anything like a compromise with innocence, for the sake of profit to the Treasury. The judgments stated are, "remission," or "mitigation," on payment of fees, or duties on costs, and sometimes of a sum certain; fifty or an hundred dollars to the revenue officers or to parties, other than the United States. Although I do not conceive the former practice of the Treasury very material on the point, yet it is some satisfaction to state, that the early decisions to which I allude seem to be guided by this principle: that the Treasury should never gain anything from fine, penalty, or forfeiture, except in case of guilt. The first case I could find, although there may have been others antecedent, was that of Robert Gillespie, in June, 1802. It was the case of an importation of porter in casks, of less capacity than those required by law. The judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury was: no wilful negligence or fraud—claim of the United States released on payment of costs and one-fourth net proceeds.

Another case was, that of Theodoric Armistead, decided in February, 1812. Brandy had been imported in casks of less capacity than required by law. The judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury was: No wilful negligence or fraud—claim of the United States released on payment of costs and charges, and two cents per gallon for the United States. And this levy is expressly stated to be in addition to the duty established by law. Why, Mr. Speaker, what a principle is this? A Secretary of the Treasury declares, in so many words, that the guilt specified in the statute, to which the penalty is annexed, does not exist, yet mulcts the individual at his discretion, as the condition on which innocence is not made subject to the penalty! If the Secretary of the Treasury can lay a tax of "two cents per gallon," why not of twenty; if he can take "one-fourth of the proceeds," according to his arbitrary will, why not the half, or the whole? In these cases what has become of that essential principle of civil liberty, that innocence and guilt shall never be confounded? Both Gillespie and Armistead, though clear by the statute, have gone away from the legal tribunal taxed by the Secretary. I dare say it will be said, they were both satisfied. Doubtless, sir, the Secretary had resolved himself into an arbitrary tribunal; and what private individual dare question the opinion of the Secretary? But it is the business of the Legislature to consider subjects in their principles and consequences, and not by the convenience of this or that individual. The importance of withstanding the beginnings of oppressive encroachments could never better be illustrated than by the instances before us. These, and cases like these, were the nest eggs of the Treasury; and now we see what a monstrous brood is likely to be produced. The Secretary has gone on year after year, exercising an arbitrary discretion in cases of small amount, and affecting individuals only, till at least he starts up a gigantic power, authorized to carve what he pleases out of twenty millions of dollars, and to settle the destinies of a whole class of citizens! If doctrines and constructions like these, are to receive the sanction of this Legislature, come Bonaparte as soon as thou wilt and thou shalt find Cabinet principles suited to all thy purposes.

I have hitherto considered the case of the merchants' bonds, as though it were strictly within the principle of the collection laws. And the bearing of my argument has been this: that if no such power, as is asserted by the Secretary, is truly vested in him, in the cases of the ordinary revenue, that much less ought he be permitted to exercise this most dangerous power, in cases of so much magnitude; and in all respects so critical, as are those under consideration. But is it true that the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, accruing under the restrictive system, have no other claims for relief, than those general ones, which arise under the collection laws? Alas! sir. The nature of these laws are such, as to make those claims far higher and more impressive.

I shall touch this subject of the restrictive system, with as much delicacy as possible. I wish not to offend any prejudices. I know that the zeal and ardent affection, which some gentlemen show for this restrictive system, very much resemble the loves of those who, according to ancient legends, had taken philtres and love powders. The ecstasy of desire is just in proportion to the deformity of the object. I shall not, however, meddle with that topic, any further than it is connected with the subject before the House.

A great deal is said about the policy of the restrictive system, and the necessity of a rigorous enforcement of it. Now, it appears to me that the desire to make this system effectual ought to induce the release of these bonds, and not their enforcement. The object of the restrictive system is averred to be, to produce a change in the measures of the British cabinet, by the suffering which the loss of our commerce occasions to her citizens. If this be the policy, then those measures are, beyond all question, the best calculated to insure its success, whose tendency is to diminish the suffering, as far as possible, of the citizens of your own country. The best chance for success must necessarily be, by convincing the thinking part of the community in Great Britain, that, while they suffer much, we suffer little or nothing. Were such the case, then indeed the system might have some hope of a prosperous result. But, when suffering there is found to be attended with suffering here, then the whole potency of the restrictive system results in this question—which can suffer the most, or which can bear suffering the best? And what judgment will the people of that country be likely to form in relation to the degree this people suffer, or their capacity to endure, when a sweep of twenty millions of dollars is seriously advocated by some, and when a majority seem inclined to turn the penalties of the restrictive system, not into a means of punishment of fraudulent or wilful violations, but into an instrument of ways and means of the Treasury? Does it need any ghost from the dead, or seer from the skies, to tell the people of Great Britain, that, in a free country, such a system of oppression must be short-lived, and that its supporters must soon become detested? So, that, if the policy of the system be consulted, it requires that its rigor should be softened as it respects your own citizens.

But, are there not other considerations materially distinguishing the character of the restrictive system from that of your collection laws, and requiring a corresponding mildness in the construction of the laws relative to the former, which the latter cannot claim? Concerning the Constitutional power of the National Legislature to pass the laws of collection, there never was any question; but, concerning its power, under the Constitution, to pass such a body of laws as those which compose the restrictive system, there always has been, there is, and ever will be, a question. A very great majority in all the commercial States always have denied that the power of regulating commerce included the power of annihilating it altogether. They believe nothing in the project, and they believe as little in your right to convert their only means of prosperity to the purposes of hostility. They ever will deny that any power is vested in this or any other body of men, to bring down direct and certain ruin on the whole commercial section of the country, under pretence of producing an indirect and uncertain pressure upon a foreign nation. Surely this is a reason for a mild exercise of the power arising under these restrictive laws. If a right be dubious, the exercise of it ought not to be made more obnoxious by oppression.

Not only the authority is dubious, but the provisions of the law outrage every received notion of Legislative prudence and foresight. They "out-Herod Herod." In six years, Congress have passed twenty laws, creating at least one hundred new offences! These offences are constituted of acts, previously not only innocent, but laudable; not only laudable, but they were the most common and necessary acts of whole sections of country, and whole classes of men. These new offences subject the offenders to the most grievous penalties, fines, and forfeitures, known to the revenue laws; and are involved in such a complexity of enactments, re-enactments, provisions, proclamations, whole revocations, and half revocations, that no man under heaven can tell when he is safe, or how or where to steer his course, without being meshed in the web spread for him by your statutes. Some idea may be had of the degree of oppression added to these penal laws by the restrictive system, from comparing the applications for remission, antecedent to the commencement of that system, with those subsequent to it. Antecedent to the 19th of April, 1806, when your restrictive system commenced, all the applications for remission, in the fifteen previous years, amounted to somewhat short of thirteen hundred. In the six years the restrictive system has been in operation, there have been nine hundred and fifty-four; and if to these be added those known at the Department, and not yet acted upon, the whole number exceeds one thousand. So that the annual average of applications for remission since the restrictive system is double the annual average of applications antecedent to that period. In other words, you have doubled the number of the snares of the law, and the cries of its victims are heard in a double proportion. Do you think, that when the web of the law is thus extended, beyond all reason and precedent, that you can strain its penalties to the extremest rigor of the statute, without public sentiment revolting against you? Is it in human nature to see its fellow struggling, innocently, in the toils of unnatural laws, without coming to its aid, and taking vengeance on its persecutors?

I know it will be said, that it is not proposed to confiscate the whole, but only a part. In other words, you will take not all that you want, but all that you dare. To this, I reply, you have no right to a single dollar—not to a cent. The merchants are free of all legal taint—they are free from all statute guilt. There is in the case neither "wilful negligence nor fraud"—the Secretary of the Treasury does not pretend either—but this is his situation, and this is the secret of his application to Congress, for their sanction to his exercise of this great discretionary power. Confiscate the whole of this immense amount!—ruin hundreds and thousands, on account of a breach of the letter of a penal statute! He dare not. Mitigate upon any principle which would aid the Treasury in its necessities! He could not. He therefore transfers the whole matter to the broad shoulders of the Legislature; talks about “the magnitude and unforeseen nature of the case;” asserts, roundly, an unlimited discretion existing in his Department; tells of “profits and extra profits” made by the merchants: of the “tax levied” by them on the community; and sums up the whole matter with a hint that “it was thought proper not to exercise his authority until Congress had taken the subject into consideration, and prescribed, if they thought proper, the course to be pursued.” Well, sir, and what do we witness now that the subject is before Congress? Why, we see every friend of the Secretary—every man who is supposed to be in his particular confidence—advocating that Congress “should think proper to prescribe no course whatever to be pursued,” but refer the whole to the absolute discretion of the Secretary. Can any man witness all this, and not understand the meaning? To my ear, it is as plain as though he uttered it in so many words on this floor. “The poverty of the Treasury, and not my will, consents. If Congress will take the odium and the risk, I will take the knife and the flesh; and I will cut where and just as much as you shall authorize.”

I shall not be able to speak upon this subject, I fear, without offending the nice sensibilities of some gentlemen in the House. Of late, an opinion seems to be gaining ground upon this floor, that a member cannot denominate a doctrine or principle to be base or wicked, without attributing those qualities to those who may have happened to advocate such doctrine or principle; and this, too, notwithstanding he expressly declares that he has no intention of applying attributes to such persons, or even intimating that their views are the same with his own upon the subject. I protest, sir, against such a restriction on the rights of debate, as totally inconsistent with the necessary freedom of public investigation. It is not only the right, but it is the duty, of every man, to whose moral perception anything proposed or asserted seems base or wicked, to brand such proposition or assertion with its appropriate epithet. He owes this duty not only to the public, but to the individual who has been unfortunate or mistaken enough to advocate such an opinion, or make such assertion. And, provided he does this, as the state of his own perception on the subject, and without attributing motives or similar perceptions of the thing to others, not only there is no reasonable ground of offence, but, on the contrary, such a course is the only one reconcilable with duty. How else shall the misguided or mistaken be roused from their moral lethargy or blindness, to a sense of the real condition or nature of things?

What mortal has an intellect so clear, as not sometimes to have his view of things doubtful or obscure? Whose moral standard is so fixed and perfect, as that it never fails him at the moment of need? If, after these explanations, any person takes an exception at the statement of my perceptions on this subject, and any hot humor should fly out into vapor upon the occasion, it has its liberty. I shall regard it no more than “the snapping of a chestnut in a farmer’s fire.”

I say, then, Mr. Speaker, that, to my view—let it be understood, sir, I do not assert that it is even the true view, much less, that it is the view of any gentleman who advocates an opposite doctrine—I say, that, to my view, and for my single self, I would as soon be concerned in a highway robbery, as in this Treasury attempt. Sir, I think a highway robbery a little higher in point of courage, and a little less in point of iniquity. In point of courage, there is obviously no comparison; in point of the quality of the moral purpose, the robber who puts his pistol to your breast, only uses his power to get your property—he attacks nothing but your person—but, in this Treasury attempt, the reputation of the victim is to be attacked, to make an apology for confiscating his property. Guilt is alleged—guilt, of which he is clear by the terms of the law—for the purpose of making him (though innocent) compound, for escaping the penalty. What is this, but making calumny the basis of plunder?

But, this is not the view of a solitary individual; I have letters on this subject from men—not merchants, nor, as I am apprized, particularly connected with the mercantile class—whose language is perfectly similar to that I have expressed. Indeed, sir, some exceed even these expressions, in bitterness and indignation. Men look very differently at a question of this kind, when they are removed a thousand miles from the sufferers, and see the principle through the fascinating medium of Treasury relief, than when they stand by the side of the victims, and see distress and ruin entailed upon innocence; or—what in a moral view is worse—witness innocence compelled to compound for mercy, as though it were guilt!

I have been told, sir, that this state of opinion ought to be concealed—that it was calculated to offend. I have been also told, that we, on this side of the House, ought not to take any part in this debate—that a party current would be made to set upon the question—and this, to the merchants, was inevitable ruin. To all this, I have but one answer: My sense of duty allows no compromise on this occasion, nor any concealment. I stand not on this floor as a commercial agent, huckstering for a bargain. As one of the Representatives of the people of Massachusetts, I maintain the rights of these men, not because they are merchants, but because they are citizens. The standard by which their rights are proposed to be measured, may be made the common standard for us all. There will soon be no safety for any man, if fines, penalties, and forfeitures, be once established as the ways and means of the Treasury.

If I could wish that evil might be done, that good might result, I should hope that you would confiscate the property of these merchants. If such a disposition really prevails in the National Legislature towards this class of men, it is desirable that it should be known. Act out your whole character—show the temper which is in you—the sooner will the people of the commercial States understand what they owe to themselves, and to their section of country, when there is no longer any veil over the purposes of the Cabinet and its supporters.

But, it will be asked, what will become, in the meantime, of the individuals whose fortunes are at stake? Trembling for the prospects of themselves and their families, they stand, like thrice-knouted Russians, before the Treasury Czar and Autocrat! I say, sir, let them be true to themselves, and be true to their class, and true to their country, and they have nothing to fear. Let them remember, that it is under the pretexes of law that tyranny makes its advances. It bribes the avarice of the many to permit it to oppress the few. It talks of necessity—necessity!—the beggar's cloak—the tyrant's plea. Let the merchants refuse all compromise, whether in the shape of loans, or of equivalents, or of commutation for extra profits. Let them scorn, while innocent, to pay any part of a penalty which is due only in case of guilt—fly to the States, and claim their Constitutional interposition—interest their humanity, to afford a shield against so grievous a tyranny! Above all, let them throw themselves upon the moral sentiment of the community, which will never countenance, when once made to realize the nature of, the oppression. And let this be their consolation, that, as in the natural, so it is often in the moral and political world—the darkest hour of the night is that which precedes the first dawning of the day.

Mr. WIDGERY followed next, in favor of remission.

TUESDAY, December 15.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying an act of incorporation to open and turnpike a road from Alexandria to the Little river turnpike road.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to increase the Navy of the United States;" and a bill "to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of John Dixon and John Murray; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, presented a bill to authorize the President of the United States to establish post routes in certain cases (express mails during the war); which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, made a report in relation to the brilliant achievements of Captains Hull, Decatur, and Jones, embracing a resolution in the form of a joint resolution of the two Houses; which was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JENNINGS reported a bill prohibiting the Judges of the Territories of the United States from holding certain offices, and regulating the qualifications of delegates to the Congress of the United States from the several Territories.—Twice read and committed.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on that part of the Message from the President which relates to the late importations from Great Britain.

The report was ordered to lie on the table, after some conversation; and the following bill from the Senate was twice read:

A Bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases.

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases where goods, wares, and merchandise, owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, have been imported into the United States from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the dependencies thereof, which goods, wares, and merchandise, were shipped and departed therefrom between the 23d day of June last, and the 15th day of September last, and the person or persons interested in such goods, wares, or merchandise, or concerned in the importation thereof, have thereby incurred any fine, penalty, and forfeiture, on such person or persons petitioning for relief to any judge or court proper to hear the same, in pursuance of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the fines, forfeitures and penalties, in certain cases therein mentioned," and on the facts being shown, on inquiry had by said judge or court, stated and transmitted as by said act is required, to the Secretary of the Treasury; in all such cases, wherein it shall be proved to his satisfaction that said goods, wares, and merchandise, at the time of their shipment were bona fide owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, and shipped, and did depart from some port or place in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the dependencies thereof, owned as aforesaid, between the 23d day of June last, and the 15th day of September last, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to remit all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, that may have been incurred in consequence of such shipment, importation, or importations, and also to direct the prosecution or prosecutions, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued, upon the costs and charges that have arisen or may arise being paid, and the duties payable on such goods, wares, and merchandise, being paid, or secured to be paid; agreeable to law. Provided nevertheless, That no case in which the purchase of such goods, wares, and merchandise, was known to exist between the United States and Great Britain, at the port or place where such purchase was made, shall be entitled to the benefit of this act.

Mr. BIBB moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GHOLSON moved to amend the motion, so as to include in it also the report of the Committee of Ways and Means above mentioned.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said, he had intended to take no part in the present debate, nor should he have now risen, at so late a stage of it, but for the declaration made by a gentleman yesterday in his place. If he could be so fortunate as to engage the attention of the House, he would promise to trouble it as short a time as possible. He understood a gentleman to state that, ever since the present Administration came into power, it had been its practice, through the instrumentality of the Secretary of the Treasury, to lay taxes on the mercantile interest, under an entire new construction of the law of 1797, which provides for mitigating and remitting forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases.

Mr. W. was here interrupted by Mr. QUINCY, who said that the bearing of his argument was wholly mistaken by the gentleman from South Carolina. Mr. Q. then proceeded to recapitulate the general points of his argument.

Mr. WILLIAMS expressed his satisfaction that the gentleman had explained; that he was not suffered to argue against a declaration which the gentleman denies, which every person near him, in common with himself, understood was made; but, sir, if the gentleman will search the records with half the industry he is capable of, he will find himself mistaken, in supposing the powers which have been exercised by the present Secretary, under the act of 1797, are novel, and founded on a different construction of the law, from that which had been given to it prior to 1801; the fact is not so.

Mr. QUINCY declared it was his intention to move for such an inquiry as soon as the present question was settled.

Mr. WILLIAMS was positively certain, let the gentleman institute what inquiry he pleases; let the whole office transactions of the Treasury be laid open to him; the more it was examined, the more clearly would it be demonstrated that he is wholly mistaken; there has been no new constructions of the law; even the very cases which the gentleman has cited, are amply justified by precedents under former Secretaries. The error which he has fallen into consists in this, he has examined only the register of the cases which have been remitted or mitigated, and not the documents relative to them, or he could not have formed an opinion, in any way approximating to that which he has advanced. The construction of the law has not been novel on the part of the present incumbent; he contended that no other discretion had been exercised, but that which the law warrants, and which had been previously practised on. The very first case on the register is one mitigated by the first Secretary of the Treasury. How does the gentleman sustain the accusation, that the merchants have been prostrated at the feet of the Treasury, and the vital principles of free Government been endangered? by citing the cases of Gillespie and of Armistead. What are those cases? The law prohibits the importations of porter in casks under a certain size, for reasons too obvious to mention; the custom-house officers seized a quantity of porter, imported by Gillespie, in vessels other than of the description warranted; the law was executed and the porter sold. Gillespie petitioned the Secretary for relief; it was granted on the condition of his paying one-fourth the amount of sales; one-half of which was distributed among the custom-house officers agreeably to law; the other half was received in discharge of the duties, which otherwise would have been lost to the Government. Can any man feel so much solicitude to criminate, as to deny that the duties ought to have been received; that the officers of the customs ought to have been so rewarded; or that the decision was made agreeably to law? He hoped not.

The case of Armistead was, if possible, still more clear; it came before Congress at the session when he first had the honor of a seat in it. He was surprised that the gentleman, who was then a member, should have alluded to it; the chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who presented the case, would correct him if he should state it incorrectly. A vessel, belonging to Mr. Armistead, sailed from a port in Europe, bound to one in the West Indies; when near the port of destination, the Captain ascertained that intercourse with the port had been interdicted by the British Government; that to proceed would be at the hazard of vessel and cargo. He, therefore, altered his voyage, and arrived at Norfolk. Unfortunately for Mr. Armistead, a part of the cargo consisted of French brandy in demijohns; the law is imperative; the brandy was forfeited, because it was imported in vessels less than the size which the law allows. Mr. Armistead petitioned Congress for relief; after much difficulty, a bill passed this House, but it was rejected in the Senate—the power to relieve being already by law vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. There certainly was, on the part of Mr. A., neither fraud nor wilful neglect; his vessel had arrived within the United States contrary to his orders. The Secretary, on application, mitigated the case, on condition that the duties should be paid, and two cents per gallon to enforce the law, by establishing a difference in favor of the legal over the illegal importations. Can any man doubt, much less deny, that the duties which would have accrued on the brandy, had it been imported in vessels of the legal size, ought to be paid? And wherefore, then, where it was relieved from forfeiture, ought they not to be received? Assuredly, it would be admitted, that importations contrary to law ought not to be placed on better terms than those made in conformity to it. Here it will be perceived, there was nothing retained for the officers of the customs; they deserved nothing; there was no attempt to smuggle, and, of course, no detection.

H. OF R.

If the Secretary has not legally the discretion exercised; if he can only mitigate where there is fraud and wilful negligence, according to the gentleman's construction, it is palpable that the innocent, as in the case of Armistead, must suffer the rigor of the law, while he who is guilty of fraud, or wilful negligence, shall alone be relieved from it. Is not this absurd? Can these cases (continued Mr. W.) present to a candid mind, anything like an assumption of power never before practised on? Do they indicate a power, as has been alleged, calculated to aggrandize the Treasury by humbling the merchants at its feet? Is it possible to discover in them the remotest danger to the vital principles of free Government? He thought not.

The gentleman might have found cases on the same register, much more analogous to the subject in hand, than those he has referred to, and which have grown out of the non-importation law. Owing to the various suspensions and re-enactment of that law, it was hardly possible for merchants to pursue even a regular course of trade, without being exposed by its various changes and penalties. It will be found, on examination, that, in many cases of forfeiture under the law, the merchants have been relieved, by paying duties on the goods as imported, proportioned in amount to the circumstances of their cases, respectively, none exceeding double duties. In all such cases of mitigation, the whole property was forfeited. Is it not strange, the gentleman should not have discovered, if the Secretary's object had been to replenish the Treasury, he had mistaken the means? for, as in all the mitigated cases, he would not discharge altogether, he had only to refuse to mitigate, also, and the whole share of the United States, in the forfeited articles, would have come into the Treasury, instead, as was the fact, of an amount only about equal to the duties. So far from the power being exerted to humble or injure the merchants, it has been used for their protection and relief, without which they would have been, in many instances, ruined. Let him examine: he will find that, notwithstanding the vast increase of commerce, the register to which he has resorted proves, on a comparison of years, that the powers vested in the Secretary of the Treasury have been exercised with more moderation, by the present incumbent, than by his predecessors. From August, 1790, to June, 1796, there were 219 cases relieved, on payment of costs; 82 mitigated; and 34 rejected. From August, 1801, to June, 1805, there were 254 cases relieved, on payment of costs; 65 mitigated; and 16 rejected; and yet the gentleman talks of moral turpitude, of an assumption of power never before practised, of a novel construction of the law! The powers vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, by the law of 1797, are absolutely necessary, indispensable; without them, the merchant would be constantly exposed to vexations, to hardships, to ruin. Your revenue laws must, of necessity, be so general and rigid in the penalties and forfeitures they impose, some alleviating, mitigating power, lodged somewhere, is indispensable to the just execution of them. By a principle of the law, the ship is forfeited, whose captain, mate, or passengers, shall smuggle into the United States dutiable articles to the amount of five hundred dollars; and, yet, the forfeiture may arise from circumstances very distinct. If the captain, mate, or passengers, shall so smuggle, as the agents of the ship's owners, or with his knowledge, it would constitute a case of fraud; if the character of the captain is notoriously base and villainous, as in many instances during the embargo, the circumstance of wilful neglect attaches; but should the revenue be defrauded to the stipulated amount, without any knowledge on the part of the owner, the ship is as much forfeited by the law, notwithstanding his personal innocence, as if he were absolutely guilty. Is it not wholesome, is it not just, there should be a sound discretion exercised in discriminating between and mitigating these cases? To be just to the Government and to the merchant, it is necessary he should be made to pay, in one case, only just so much as will make him sensible that he is always answerable, so far as the revenue is concerned, for the good conduct of the persons he employs, while in the others, he ought to suffer severely. One word more about the law of 1797; he found written over the title of the law, in the volume which he held, these words, "Gallatin voted against this law." Why he did, said Mr. W., I shall not inquire, for, no matter how he voted, or by what reasons he was induced, it is the law of the land, and he is just as much bound to obey it, as if he had voted for it. This circumstance reminded him of the argument of his worthy colleague, when he referred to the Journal for the vote of the Secretary on the law; he was sorry, on that occasion, to see his friend descend from a stand he can occupy with so much credit to himself, to see him abandon the pinions on which he can soar against the blaze of every argument, to assume the situation of the gentleman from North Carolina; he should ever protest against any other person's thumbing the Journals for the votes of 1798, except the gentleman from North Carolina.

The subject now immediately before us, (continued Mr. W.,) though very important as to amount, was to his mind very circumscribed as to its real merits; it is simply what is the proper tribunal. Shall the petitions of the importers of British manufactures be decided by Congress, or by the Secretary of the Treasury? He had considered it material to a just decision, to satisfy his mind, and he thought it equally incumbent on others—how came the property in England? With the pounds, shillings, and pence of the merchant, he conceived we had nothing to do; it illy comports with the dignity of this body, nor was it necessary that we should inquire what were his ordinary or extraordinary profits, unless indeed, we contemplated going back to the first embarrassments and subsequent losses, the necessary measures of Government had occasioned him. How came the property in England? Did it get there contrary to any statutory provision?

Was there any prohibition whatever on exports to Great Britain? Was it at all contrary to the policy of the Government? He answered no. When you unfortunately rejected the embargo, when you thereby abandoned the policy of non-exportation, for a system of non-importation, the right to export was as free and as perfect as it ever had been. The merchant who exported the produce of the soil to Great Britain, was not less patriotic in so doing, than was the agriculturist who sold it to him, knowing it was destined for that market; it was therefore exported neither contrary to law nor policy, and was there as fairly as it could have been anywhere. In what situation, then, did the merchant find himself, on the revocation of the Orders in Council? He saw the obnoxious system, which had so injured his country, abandoned, for the suspension of which he knew his Government had exerted every nerve, and the faith of which he saw pledged for the repeal of the non-importation law. If the course which had been adopted by the Administration, and approved everywhere, on Erskine's arrangement, on the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, was not a just ground for calculating that the law would be repealed, the advice of the Government's Representative at the Court of London, and their reiterated promises, most assuredly were. Did the merchant who shipped, after a knowledge of the declaration of war, act less reasonably? Not only his property, but his person was in danger; confiscation and imprisonment hung over him; was he to remain in England under such circumstances? Where could he go but home? All the rest of the world was occluded to him. His leaving England, then, was the effect of inevitable necessity, rather than of choice. Could he apprehend less kindness from his own Government, than had been shown by that very Government to the subjects of its declared enemy? He could not but believe, from its known character, at least the same leniency would be exercised toward him. More, sir; he knew that a permanent article of the Treaty of '94 had, by wise forecast, been provided for his case; he knew the faith of the two Governments had been mutually pledged to suffer the departure of the citizens and subjects of both, on the breaking out of a war; he knew that Congress had, at the last session, passed a special act, permitting the departure of all British subjects with their property. Was it possible he could imagine his own Government would thus secure the benefits of the treaty provision to British subjects, and deny it to American citizens? He could not—he ought not. He wished not to be misunderstood on this point; he contended that that class was entitled to relief, not because the property was in England simply, but that it was there at the breaking out of the war; the house was in flames, it must escape or perish. Can the intention, then, with which the goods were imported, be of an improper character? Was there any attempt to deceive the revenue officers? Was the importation attempted to be made in a clandestine manner? No, sir. The merchant then found himself, at the declaration of war, in England, with his property; he must lose it or bring it off; pray how could it be brought, except by vesting it in British manufactures? Specie was out of the question. Is there any article of export from thence, in which it could have been vested, other than British? Look to the testimony on file; even heirs, here, resort to the same medium through which to receive the property they are entitled to by the demise of relations there. If, then, the property which was in England at the revocation of the Orders in Council, and the breaking out of the war, had been accumulated in a fair course of trade, not contrary either to your laws or policy; if its importation here was warranted by a reasonable—a moral certainty—that the law would be repealed in the one case, and, in the other, was the effect of necessity growing out of the war; if there is no trace of guilt, nor of an intention to violate the law, can it be possible that this House will attempt to exact any portion of the penalties? He hoped not.

He did not believe that a discharge of the bonds involved the propriety of repealing the non-importation law. No future case could arise similar to those under discussion; unless, indeed, there should be another revocation of the Orders in Council there, and another declaration of war here; without, there can be no similar reasons for relief. He was decidedly opposed to a repeal of the non-importation law. What if it had been resorted to as a substitute for war, when we were anxious to avoid it, was that a reason for repealing now that war was made? If experience had proved the system is injurious to the opposition, it was, therefore, the more necessary to retain it, in all its vigor, now it had become our duty to do him all the harm in our power. That it is a powerful instrument in our hands, is no longer doubtful—the fact stands confessed. The law, too, has, much to the credit of the merchants, been enforced and can continue to be, all the predictions to the contrary notwithstanding. It was surprising to hear gentlemen contend against the practicability of enforcing the law, at the same time they quote the examination before the House of Commons as a proof of its efficacy. Yes, sir, the law has been enforced; the English manufacturers have sorely felt; its pressure upon them has caused a revocation of the Orders in Council, and for one, he never would consent, while we were at war, to throw away so powerful a weapon with which, standing on our soil, we could reach, at three thousand miles distance, the vitals of our enemy.

The policy of the course recommended he could not approve; the subject had been brought to our consideration, not only by the petitioners, but the Executive; it has become, therefore, our duty to decide; the responsibility of the decision ought to be with the House, rather than burden any individual with it. He could not consent so great a cause—so many millions—should be placed at the discretion of any man. The Secretary of the Treasury was worthy of all the confidence we ought to bestow; he could not but feel proud of the institutions of his country, whenever he contemplated his present elevation; he was an illustrious example that, practically, the rich and the poor have the same avenues to honor and renown equally open to them; under every disadvantage he had been the architect of his fame; he landed on your soil penniless;—no, sir, he was robbed the first night after he touched it of every cent. Could he expose such a man to the rage of the whole community? No, sir; the patronage was too great—the discretion was too much. He would not refer it even to his worthy friend from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON.)

If he had not already engrossed too much of the time of the House, he would exhort it to beware of irritation, which had been attempted to be excited; he conjured the majority not to suffer its indignation, so strangely and unnecessarily provoked, to get the better of its discretion. A pecuniary consideration of the subject had also been pressed on the House; if it must be viewed in that light he had not the least doubt the Treasury would receive much more by the duties than by a forfeiture of the bonds. Both was impossible; the first would be paid cheerfully, the latter only by extortion; prosecute them, you will not recover one in an hundred; every advantage will be taken. Can you expect a merchant will expose his family to want, when in his power to prevent it? For such an object they will not be over-scrupulous about the means. Will you appeal to the law against the wealth of a great and influential part of the community, when it will scarcely be possible to find a jury not interested against you? Begin the prosecution when you please, the lawyer on your side, the juror your enemy, you will be cast. Can you doubt the merchants will make common cause against you? Who are the most injured by these importations? Indisputably the previous holder of British manufactures. If the great supplies of these articles have yielded extraordinary profits, as gentlemen contend, how much greater would have been his profits who held these articles, had not these importations been made? These, then, are the persons who suffer most—who have the greatest cause to complain—and yet there is not the slightest murmur among them. Nor did he believe that the bonds could be collected in certain parts of the Union, because he recollected how impossible it had been to execute the law prohibiting the trade in Africans; obnoxious as is that traffic, it had never been put down, for even where the forms of the law in some places were complied with, its spirit was not. He knew a fine ship about three hundred tons libelled, condemned, offered at public auction by the marshal, and bid off by the former owner at five dollars. You can have indisputable proof that a hoghead of glass, of the late importations, has been appraised at eight dollars, the first article out of which sold for twelve! Can you succeed under such circumstances in recovering $20,000,000? Impossible.

Some gentlemen have attempted to persuade the House it ought not to be influenced by the great amount of property at stake, but should decide on it, as if it was only the case of A or B. This was correct enough in the general, but why do the same gentlemen shrink from it themselves? The importations bring made contrary to law, are forfeited; if the amount is not to be considered, why is it that we hear of exacting only the extraordinary profits? for even his worthy friend from Georgia, (Mr. BIBB,) with all his zeal in the cause, asks for no more. The amount, in his judgment, was all important; nothing was more to be deprecated at the present moment than to excite disgust and irritation in the community; surely these would be in proportion to the amount of property forfeited.

When he considered all the circumstances of the case; the reasonable ground the merchant had to calculate on a repeal of the law; the necessity he was exposed to of leaving England with his property; the extreme novelty and danger of the policy, and the inexpediency of attempting to enforce the penalties, he could not refrain from voting to discharge all fair cases of bona fide American property.

After considerable debate in which Messrs. WILLIAMS, QUINCY, RANDOLPH, STANFORD, and MACON, took part, the House adjourned without coming to any decision.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

Mr. BOND presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Illinois Territory, praying that a Land Office may be established in said Territory, and for pre-emption rights to the tracts of land on which they have settled respectively.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. QUINCY rose to make a motion. He prefaced it by some general observations favorable to the policy of conferring honorary rewards for bravery and noble conduct; and certainly, he remarked, no class of men more justly deserved the meed of honor than those attached to our gallant little Navy. But, as it was a part of the duty of this House to pass such votes, it was also their duty to see them carried into execution. He applied these remarks to the vote by Congress of a gold medal, sword, &c. to Commodore Preble and his companions in arms, for their spirited exertions before Tripoli. He stated, also, that an appropriation of $20,000 had been made and expended to carry this vote into effect; and yet he said he believed no officer concerned had received the swords voted to them—if they had, he had not been able to hear of one. As to the medal voted to Commodore Preble, and the month's pay to the seamen, his knowledge did not extend. But if the swords were given, as the resolution directed, to those who had distinguished themselves on that occasion, it was as necessary to the object of the vote that their names should be known as that the swords should be received. He therefore proposed a resolution as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the proceedings which have been had under the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1805, whereby the President of the United States was requested to cause a gold medal to be presented to Commodore Edward Preble, and a sword to each of the officers and midshipmen who distinguished themselves in the attack on the town, batteries, and naval force, of Tripoli; and that he be also requested to state the names of the officers who have received swords by virtue of the above-mentioned resolution, accompanying the same with an account of the expenditure of the appropriation of twenty thousand dollars, made for those objects, and specifying the objects to which the unexpended balance of said appropriation, if there were any such, have been applied."

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. QUINCY and Mr. KING were appointed a committee to present the resolution to the President.

The bill from the Senate "to increase the Navy of the United States" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill of this House to increase the Navy of the United States.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines and penalties in certain cases.

The SPEAKER declared the motion yesterday made by Mr. GHOLSON to be out of order.

The question recurred on indefinite postponement of the bill; which, after a few remarks from Mr. RHEA in favor of the motion, was decided in the negative, as follows:

So it was determined that the bill should not be indefinitely postponed.

It was then moved, by Mr. ROBERTS, that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, to consider thereon.

A motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole superseded that motion. The motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole was negatived—64 to 59; and the bill was then referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the following bill from the Senate, which had been previously twice read in the House:

A bill to increase the Navy of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States shall be, and he hereby is, authorized forthwith to cause to be built, equipped, and employed, four ships to rate not less than seventy-four guns, and six ships to rate forty-four guns each.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed on board of each of the said ships of seventy-four guns each, one captain, six lieutenants, one first lieutenant and one second lieutenant of marines, one surgeon, one chaplain, one purser, and three surgeon's mates.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed in each of the said ships, carrying seventy-four guns, the following warrant officers, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States: one master, one second master, three master's mates, one boatswain, one gunner, one carpenter, one sailmaker, and twenty midshipmen; and the following petty officers, who shall be appointed by the captains of the ships, respectively, in which they are to be employed, viz: one armorer, six boatswain's mates, three gunner's mates, two carpenter's mates, one sailmaker's mate, one cooper, one steward, one master at arms, one cook, one coxswain, one boatswain's yeoman, one gunner's yeoman, one carpenter's yeoman, ten quarter gunners, eight quartermasters, one clerk, and one schoolmaster, also to be appointed by the captain.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the crews of each of the said ships of seventy-four guns shall consist of two hundred able seamen, three hundred ordinary seamen and boys, three sergeants, three corporals, one drummer, one fifer, and sixty marines.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the pay of the schoolmaster shall be twenty-five dollars per month and two rations.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of two millions five hundred thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the building and equipping of the aforesaid ships of war.

Mr. SAWYER made a motion to add the word

H. OF R.

"teen" to "four," so as to make it fourteen 74-gun ships.

Mr. S. thought it a proper occasion to try the question, whether we were to have a Navy or not? He took the occasion to congratulate the House upon the repeated victories of our little navy over the enemy; and of the grateful prospect of a speedy termination to the despotism of the seas. National piracy is about to be exterminated, and all nations permitted to traverse their great highway in safety. The thing can be done; and if we say so, with the will of God, will be done. The experiment upon which the proof hangs has been made. British arms cannot withstand American upon the sea. The bully has been disgraced by an infant; and fear shall no longer restrain an abject world from vindicating its long violated rights. Give us but a respectable fleet, and it is all we ask. But what can we do with four seventy-fours? They are a mere mockery. If we do mean to make a serious stand upon the ocean, such a force must be out of all character. If we mean merely to annoy her trade, (and he trusted we meant more,) frigates will do; but, to make any serious impression that way, we must have a respectable fleet; at least, in his opinion, fourteen sail-of-the-line. That would give us a preponderance on our own coast, and enable us to bring in our prizes with safety. Who can bear the idea of our being obliged to burn or sink all the ships we may take from the enemy, for fear of their being recaptured? He thought we should save enough by the protection they would afford to our prizes to support the expense of them. We can easily support such a force. The expense, distributed over our widely extended population, would be less than a dollar a head; and, where is the American who would grudge such a sum for such an object? The people, I am confident, will cheerfully pay it, because we are now at war, and a navy is found the most efficient weapon in our hands against the enemy. He therefore trusted that if it was the disposition of the House to have a navy, they would establish such a one as would answer some purpose.

Mr. SEYBERT said, he did not anticipate that the bill from the Senate would have been called for to-day by the chairman of the Naval Committee; notwithstanding he had bestowed some attention on the subject, he confessed his remarks would be made in a manner not entirely satisfactory to himself; he would, however, proceed with them.

Mr. Chairman, said he, I wish it was as easy to build, equip, and man the seventy-fours, as it will be to add the word "teen" to "four," as is proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina. So far from adding to the number of these ships, contemplated by the bill, he had intended to move that no seventy-four gun ships should be, at this time, authorized by the Legislature.

On a former occasion, Mr. S. continued, when a naval establishment was the subject under consideration, he stated at length his reasons for opposing the propositions before the House. The opinions which he then advanced concerning an extensively permanent naval establishment for the United States were still believed to be well grounded. He did not hesitate to declare his intention, at this time, and under the pressure of present circumstances, to yield much to general feelings, and the sentiments of the nation; nevertheless, he should guard against being carried too far by the current of popular opinion. It is equally my duty, said he, to keep in view what is conceived to be the permanent and vital national interest. He declared a uniform opposition to that establishment, which could not be brought within the means and resources of the nation to maintain it. We have made war, said he, to guarantee the honor and independence of the nation, as well as for the support of the just rights of our citizens; with these objects in view, he had consented to authorize a regular force of 25,000 men, and advocated one more numerous, though in principle he was opposed to standing armies. If, then, a great portion of my fellow-citizens deem an increase of the Naval Establishment essential to promote the great work, why should it be refused on my part? No opposition would be made by him to the principle or spirit of the bill before the House, though, he confessed, he did not approve the provisions as to the kind of force therein contemplated.

Mr. S. continued.—At this time our principal object should be, to authorize that species of force which can be furnished in the shortest period, and which promises to be the most efficient in the present contest. If the views of the Government were not now confined to the present war, he considered it inexpedient to build public ships. It was necessary that the revenue should be cautiously applied. If it be employed so as to carry on the war with vigor, he would not shrink from any appropriations which could tend to produce that effect; by protracting the contest for the want of means, expense will be accumulated, and we should achieve nothing.

Mr. S. would not assent to an increase of the Navy, with a view to reconcile other measures to the opposition—to him that vote promised no such result. Our political opponents, continued he, will tell us, as regards the Navy, you are doing right to add to it; thus far we will go with you; we always maintained this to be the proper course; as to your golden dreams in Canada, we will abandon them to yourselves exclusively. Such were his present impressions; it would gratify him to find himself to have been mistaken. He declared his intention to oppose the building of 74's, or double-decked ships, and to advocate a greater number of the largest class frigates. If, however, his statements should not prove satisfactory to the House, he declared the failure would not induce him ultimately to vote against that species of force which a majority might deem expedient.

If, said Mr. S., the great reason, for now laying the keels of the double-decked ships, be (as was lately acknowledged elsewhere by high authority) to test the intentions of the Legislature as to a permanent naval establishment, he, for one, declared, he would not thus be tested, nor could he be thereby induced to vote in favor of the proposition; he would always be governed by circumstances.

The declaration of the committee, that it was proper to meet "like with like," or, in other words, because the British have seventy-four gun ships, the United States should have them of the same class, would have no effect on him. We might as well say, because there are ships in the British service, which carry one hundred and twenty guns, we should also have such. This reasoning is fallacious. No one has attempted to advocate the latter proposition. Admitting that you had four seventy-four gun ships on your Navy list, he maintained, they would answer no good purpose. In the course of the following year, their number will be more than doubled and trebled on the part of the enemy. The consequence would be, that your most expensive ships must either combat under very unpromising circumstances, or they would be blockaded in your harbors, and then be worse than useless; they must be kept at a heavy expense, and their crews would deprive other ships of the men necessary for their equipment. He said, the opinions which he had just advanced were not the result of idle speculations at the fireside; they were supported by intelligent commanders, and rested upon the firm base of experience; they were confirmed by the conversations of some whose splendid achievements adorned the pages of our Revolutionary history, and by others, who rank as heroes of the present war. He asked, why need we resort to other authority, when that of the head of the Naval Department can be brought to bear testimony in favor of the propositions laid down? In the year 1798, the Secretary of the Navy informed the House that twelve seventy-fours, as many frigates, and twenty or thirty smaller vessels "would probably be found sufficient to insure our future peace with the nations of Europe." In 1811, it was declared that, "twelve sail of seventy-fours and twenty well-constructed frigates, with our smaller vessels," were necessary to annoy the commerce of the enemy, and guard our coasts. To this he added that, in the year 1811, during a state of peace with the United States, the British had seven ships-of-the-line on the American stations, independent of frigates, and smaller vessels; at the same time, they had thirty-nine ships-of-the-line on the stocks! Tell me, said he, what is to keep a great proportion of them from your coast in 1813?

Mr. Chairman, proceeded Mr. S., I am disposed to doubt your having the timber in your yards, which will be necessary for the frames of the double-decked ships, contemplated by the bill. A ship of this description requires, for the frame, 30,000 cubic feet of timber, and 60,000 cubic feet additional for plank, wales, &c. The purchase of the timber supposed to be on hand was authorized by an act passed in the month of February, 1799. My information on this subject states, that from the years 1800 to 1802, inclusive, the timber originally designed for the seventy-fours, by the Government of the United States, was deposited in the several navy yards, as follows: At Boston, 40,036 cubic feet; at Portsmouth (New Hampshire) 18,706 feet; at New York 18,676 feet; at Philadelphia 20,426 feet; at Norfolk 18,542 feet; making a total of 116,386 cubic feet. It is generally admitted, that of the timber originally procured, as much as is required for two of the ships has been necessarily applied to other purposes; so that we must deduct 60,000 cubic feet from the quantity delivered, this leaves a balance of 56,386 cubic feet, a quantity scarcely sufficient for the frames of two such vessels! He could not satisfy himself how the timber for the other two frames was to be procured in time; it will require months for its selection, cutting, and seasoning; if you fail to fell it before the end of February, you hazard much as to its durability; twelve months are required to build a seventy-four, after the materials shall be ready in the yard. The timber for the larger ships can only be procured from the South, say Georgia, Louisiana, and Florida; consider the risks attending its transportation by sea; will you pretend to insure its arrival? These are all important considerations at this time.

He further objected to the tonnage allowed by the committee for the seventy-fours. They were rated at 1,620 tons. Experienced and intelligent naval architects, pronounce this much too little. Mr. Humphreys of Philadelphia, well known for his knowledge and skill in ship-building, says, double-decked ships should not be less than 2,000 tons; the statements of your committee as coming from this gentleman, were draughted when he was not allowed to give scope to his views. Your larger class of frigates, which have proved so serviceable, measure 1,444 tons, and rate as forty-fours. Is it probable, that the addition of 176 tons to their dimensions will enable a vessel to carry thirty additional pieces of ordnance, much more weighty than those already in use? This to him appeared to be impossible. If it be intended to have the ships of the higher rates, he hoped they would not be cramped in their dimensions—that to him was false economy. Give to them, said he, their full tonnage, and you will find your account in so doing. Formerly the British ships were limited in their tonnage; the French, by extending the dimensions of their line of battle ships, have carried the British from their ancient usages; shall we remain stationary, and continue the exploded errors of other naval Powers? Certainly not—adopt the advice of Humphreys, do not remain behind; take a bold lead; give bent to the genius of your naval constructors; and force the people of Europe to imitate you in dimensions, as they have already done in regard to the beautiful forms of your ships.

Suppose, then, that the timber originally procured for the seventy-fours shall only be adapted for those of 1,620 tons, it will be advantageous to reduce it to dimensions proper for forty-four gun ships. By this reduction you will suffer a loss of one eighth, say for the two frames ten thousand dollars; this he considered as trifling compared with the consequences which must follow an ill founded precedent. Last year, it will be recollected, it was admitted this timber might be used for frigates.

I do not doubt, Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. S., but that I have already fatigued the Committee with my dry calculation—it is hoped they will indulge me with their attention to a few remarks concerning frigates. I am desirous to add a respectable number to those already authorized, say from twelve to fifteen of the first class; this will give you more additional guns than the bill contemplates. Your forty-fours are superior to any of the British frigates; if you doubt this, ask Captains Dacres and Carden, they will not deny it. When the enemy is in search of your forty-fours, if he acts with his frigates, you may be sure of being victorious: if for this purpose he selects a higher rate of vessels, he will incur a great additional expense, and give you the chance of out-sailing him, or you will force him to change his present system, and add a new class of vessels to those which he has already adopted. Under a stiff breeze, your frigates will run from the ships-of-the-line; in boisterous times, a seventy-four may be forced to close her lower ports, then with your heavy frigates you might hazard a combat. The divided form in which this force will appear on the ocean, will enable you to annoy the commerce of the enemy; to capture his frigates and carry his squadrons from your coast and harbors. If our ships are concentrated in squadrons, the enemy will seek you with a force far superior; you must then combat under disadvantages or endeavor to make your ports for safety, and there you will be blockaded. By adding to the present number of forty-fours, you give an uniformity to your system, which in the end will prove very economical, the work will be sooner and much better executed; every surplus of materials will answer equally well for any one of the ships; in case a vessel shall be injured by the tempest or be disabled in action, she will be much sooner fitted for service, as you will be prepared with a surplus of masts, spars, and other equipments. Under such regulations you need not multiply expense by keeping a numerous crew in port, idle for weeks, until a mast can be procured; by adding the number proposed you will have a respectable class of efficient ships. Such ships, sir, will enable you to confirm and perpetuate the splendid victories of Hull, Jones, and Decatur; these heroes have already, in five months after the declaration of war, destroyed the charm of British invincibility on the ocean;—their deeds surpass any which the British naval annals can boast; they have humbled British pride. These actions will have a great effect on the Powers of Europe; your flag will hereafter be respected as a friend, as an enemy it will be feared;—believe me, sir, Great Britain has lost more in glory than had you conquered the Canadas. Mr. Brougham has been taught that your “assembled navies” can do more than “lay siege to an English sloop of war.”

Mr. BASSETT said he was placed, thinking as he did, in an awkward situation by the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, for, by voting for it, he should unquestionably gain largely, and yet under circumstances he was obliged to vote against it. He was not prepared now to enter into any lengthy argument on this subject; but it appeared to him that the speech of his friend from Pennsylvania was favorable to the principle of the bill, inasmuch as he had passed it over and attacked the details of the subject. On this head Mr. B. said he must confess he was not able to present his information to the Committee in as authoritative a way as he could wish; but, it would be recollected that as long ago as last year, the Secretary of the Navy had stated that a considerable portion of the timber necessary for seventy-fours was at this time provided and deposited in the navy yards. The committee (of which Mr. B. is chairman) were not, he said, authorized to say that the whole of the frames for four seventy-fours are in readiness. He believed the fact to be otherwise; but more than two-thirds of these frames, the important part of a vessel of war, were ready, and were distributed at four different yards in readiness for use. Mr. B. said, he agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that a larger tonnage would be preferable for seventy-fours than 1,600 tons; and he was perfectly satisfied a larger would be adopted, and that the tonnage of a seventy-four, to carry eighty-six guns, would be from 17 to 1800 tons. As far as he could learn from naval men, Mr. B. said, the most efficient ship now in service was a vessel of eighty-six guns. He thought none of the arguments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania went to the principle of the bill. They had better take it as it was, amend it as they chose, and authorize the building of so many vessels as our resources were now equal to. There were a variety of general views of this subject which might be presented to the House, but which he would reserve until the bill was on its passage.

Mr. McKEE said, he had not expected this subject would have been taken up to-day, or to say anything on it when it should be taken up. But, said he, for what purpose, I feel impelled to ask, are you going to build these vessels? Are you to spend four or five millions of dollars, in addition to your present extraordinary expenditures, to protect commerce? Will this old argument, in favor of a navy, now be used, which we have so often heard heretofore? Sir, where is your commerce now to protect? Will you protect that clandestinely destined to Great Britain? No, surely. Will you protect that destined to the coast of France? Let us reflect what commerce you can carry on with France. None worth protection, or of any moment to the great body of the American people. Does France purchase your tobacco or cotton, which heretofore have found a market there? She has never been a purchaser of provisions or breadstuffs. What is the state of trade between us and France? Your cotton, in France, is taxed with enormous duties. No man who is not under the influence of the moon would, at this time, think of making a shipment there. Would you ship your commerce there merely to surrender so much property into the grasp of the Emperor? It would be the extreme of folly. Where, then, will you protect your commerce? To the Baltic, sir? You can carry on in that quarter no commerce at all interesting to the great body of the American people. In what does your export to that region consist? In articles of colonial produce; not in articles the produce of your soil. Will you tax the great agricultural community for the purpose of protecting this extraneous commerce? I ask if the people of the West, the Atlantic, of the Middle States, or of any other portion of the American people, will be content to be taxed to support a navy for the protection of a commerce in foreign produce, by which but few individuals in the nation can be benefited? There is no commerce to protect, unless it be that which exchanges specie for the productions of the East Indies, and benefits no part of the community. Having no valuable commerce now to protect, the object of adding vessels to your navy, must be to fight your battles at sea.

If you would propose a navy as a means of carrying on war, bend your resources to that object. We have been told that the trident of Neptune is passing into our hands. But, sir, the sovereignty of the ocean is not to be acquired by four ships-of-the-line and five or six frigates. You can have no legitimate object in building such vessels as proposed, unless it be to carry on the war. If that be your object, make your means commensurate to the end you have in view.

Do you yet contend that the object is to protect commerce? Your commerce is not worth the cost. And who would pay it? The merchants? No, sir. They will pay only their proportion. I recollect, when a boy, to have seen a little book, in which I admired the pictures more than the reading, in which were the representations of a king, a priest, a soldier, and a farmer; a label issuing from the mouth of each contained these words: The King says, "I govern all;" the priest, "I pray for all;" the soldier, "I fight for all;" and the farmer, "I pay for all." This, sir, is perfectly true as regards the American farmers—they pay for all. And what advantage do they derive from it? What advantage are my constituents to derive from the expenditure of this money?

I know it will be said our naval officers have fought well. They have so; but in no instance have they done more than was expected from them. It was always expected, when they came in contact with an enemy, that they would either conquer, or make a good fight. I foresaw, at the last session, whether our navy was successful or not, that it was a necessary consequence of the war, that we should have a navy. If they had been unsuccessful, they would have fought well. The argument in that case would have been: "Here are your seamen captured; your flag prostrate on the main; will you not stretch forth your hand to relieve them from disgrace?" I scarcely know how I could have resisted such an argument. No man doubted, but every portion of the American people, fighting in the cause of their country, would fight bravely. They are brave; but that is no reason why our great agricultural interest should be taxed for the interest of merchants trading with specie to Abyssinia or China. The American agriculturists must pay nine-tenths of the tax which this expenditure will create. Do they derive equal advantage from it with the merchants? No. Of what advantage is it to the people of the Middle States, whether a ship loaded with Spanish milled castings is taken or gets safe to her place of destination? The loss is of so much capital, but adds nothing to the profit or prosperity of the agricultural interest, any more than as the gain of an individual promotes the general prosperity. It is unjust to tax the people of the West to build ships of war to protect the coast. Each portion of the United States, the Atlantic, the Western, and Middle States, have their rights; and we have no right to tax one for what can be of no benefit to it. Then, sir, if these vessels are to be used as means of carrying on war, erect an establishment adequate to the object. It will be said, perhaps, we have not money to build fourteen frigates. Our present expenses, we find, requires a loan of twenty millions. The passage of this bill, it is said, will only make it twenty-five millions. The building of fourteen ships-of-the-line instead of four, will only add ten millions to that sum!

It would be, indeed, an interesting object to the people of this country to see Great Britain humbled at our feet. You are not to do it, sir, by four ships-of-the-line, though you may do much with fourteen. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not mean to vote for any increase of our navy; but, if it is increased, I should be in favor of fourteen ships-of-the-line. I wish it also to be understood that, at the last session, I committed myself to lay taxes to carry on the war. I consider myself bound to vote for them. But, if you thus expend money on these chimerical objects, I state, distinctly, I will not vote for taxes. Other gentlemen may do as they please; but I will not, in such case, vote for the taxes, because I never will tax my constituents to defend commerce on the ocean. If it be not competent to its own defence, it is high time to give it up.

Mr. McKim rose to set his friend from Kentucky right as to one or two points. The ships to be built are not for the protection of commerce, but to be put under the direction of the Government, to protect our rights on the ocean, and also to aid in the security of our territorial rights. They will be employed in conveying our commerce, in repelling ships of war from our harbors; in destroying the commerce of Britain on the ocean, in order to force her to come to terms with us. They will be so employed as the Government conceives the interest of the nation to require. The gentleman has drawn a distinction between commerce and agriculture. In my opinion, said Mr. McK., they have a common interest. Agriculture will flourish if commerce be protected. Whoever draws a distinction between these interests, as to mutual connexion and the necessity of general protection, does not, in my opinion, view the subject in a true light. There is an inseparable connexion, and commerce cannot be protected if agriculture be trampled upon. True, sir, we have but little commerce at present; and I have no idea that it will be worth while to employ our ships to convoy the trifling trade we have now. It is future interest that is in view.

As to France, who, being engaged in a very destructive war, has thought proper to adopt (as we have done) commercial restrictions as a measure of waging it with effect, we can have but little trade with her. But I will observe to the gentleman, from the little knowledge I have of the subject, that one article, an important staple of our country, does well there. I allude to cotton; it is one of the permitted articles, and latterly has been a beneficial article of export, and large profits have been made upon it.

It would appear, sir, as if the gentleman supposed that the whole expense of building and navigating these ships is to be derived from the Western people. If gentlemen will turn to the bills presented at the last session for laying taxes, they will discover that a large proportion of them were intended to be drawn from the commercial cities; that the country part does not bear more than its proportionate share of those taxes.

The gentleman says, if we are to have a navy, it should be large, adequate to the object contemplated. I approve of his design, sir; but it is not to be supposed that the United States, now without a navy, can at once build one up. My opinion is, that the bill contemplates as great an increase of force as is within our power within the present year, and the next session will be time enough to provide for more. Rome was not built in a day, is a common adage. A powerful navy cannot be expected to be built at once; and the best way is to advance step by step, but in detail, as the resources and convenience of the United States will admit. Mr. McK. concluded by expressing a hope that the amendment will not pass.

Mr. MITCHELL made a few observations favorable to the bill, and against amending it. He remarked that much of the timber was already prepared, that guns had heretofore been cast and yet remained on hand for the seventy-fours. Perhaps seventy-fours were not the best description of vessels; but he would take the bill as it stood, in preference to risking its loss by attempting to amend it.

The question was then taken on Mr. SAWYER'S motion and negatived; and the Committee rose.

THURSDAY, December 17,

Mr. BACON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Springfield in Massachusetts, employed in the public armory in said town, and residing on the lands ceded by the State of Massachusetts to the United States, stating that, owing to their residence on the said lands, the Supreme Court of that State have decided that they are not citizens of the said State, and that they have no right as electors; and praying that their case may be taken into consideration, and such relief granted as may appear to be proper.—Referred to a select committee; and Mr. BACON, Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. TURNER, Mr. ELY, and Mr. STURGES, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate the Commercial Company of the City of Washington; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, enclosing a report of the Land Commissioners in the Western District of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "approving the report of the Commissioners appointed by the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle the exterior line of the public land at West Point, in the State of New York;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to increase the Navy of the United States.

Mr. SEYBERT moved to amend the first section of the bill by striking out "four seventy-fours and," so as to erase the provision for building vessels of that description.

Mr. GOLD.—The provision in the bill to introduce ships-of-the-line into the Navy, I consider, Mr. Chairman, as fixing the great policy of a navy under this Government. Frigates we have had, but in common with petty nations; for the Barbary Powers have frigates; the provision now offered rises higher and promises something worthy of the Constitution, something honorable to the Government. I rejoice, Mr. Chairman, at the favorable circumstances and hail the auspices under which we now meet this question; we are no longer left to erring speculations, to uncertain reasoning, but have under our eyes the sure and infallible test of experience, of practice in war with a naval force. Within a few weeks our tars have thrice grappled with the enemy, and thrice have they triumphed in combat; the success has swelled the American bosom with joy from Orleans to Maine—all, without exception of party, vie in demonstrations of joy and in the bestowment of honors upon the victors.

While such a scene is presented here, gloom and dissatisfaction prevail in the metropolis of Great Britain—those, who have been so long accustomed to conquer, receive the capture of the Guerriere with as much astonishment as they would behold a suspension of the laws of nature. A strange event to Britons!

How often, sir, has it been echoed and re-echoed within these walls, that it would be in vain to attempt anything with a navy against Great Britain, unless we could bring ship to ship and man to man—could equal our enemy on the ocean. How much mistaken have gentlemen been; how vain is human reason! The earliest stage of the first war under the Government has yielded a clear, full, and incontestable refutation of the argument. While the American arms have suffered disgrace upon disgrace on what was deemed the natural and proper theatre for the display of our power; while by land all is gloomy and comfortless, and the heart sickens under the past, our little Navy, a handful of men, has nobly sustained us upon the ocean, and banished that despondency which our disasters by land must have otherwise produced.

H. OF R.

If, sir, under such auspices, such overwhelming evidence of the efficiency of a navy, this question is to be put by, I shall despair of a navy; we may rank with Algiers in a force of frigates, but shall do nothing worthy of a community of eight millions of souls, placed by Heaven in a situation most favorable to commerce and naval power.

The objections, sir, to a navy are not a little amusing. Do you move the question in peace, it is objected, that commerce flourishes and you want not protection; at another time it is said not to be worth the expense of a navy, and lastly a navy will draw America into the European vortex and involve us in a war. Now that we are in war, a new book of logic is opened, and it is objected, that you have not time to build a navy, the war will be over before ships can be finished. It is thus, sir, that the arguments against a navy are made to answer and refute themselves; nay, more, the argument in war is a satire and reproach to the objection in peace. "There is not now time to build a navy," reproaches us for not having passed the requisite laws at the last session.

I have always considered the great policy of a navy settled by the Constitution; need I spend time to show, that no great specific power was delegated to the General Government unless it was deemed necessary; not necessary for a dormitory, but to be executed for the general protection and welfare. This was the polar star—the test and criterion that governed in the delegation of powers by the States—powers not necessary to be exercised for the general good were retained by the several States. What greatly strengthens the argument is, the power to provide a navy is not only given to the General Government, but taken away or denied to the several States. In adopting the Constitution, this question was considered at rest, and a navy was deemed the necessary consequence of this power; in the Virginia Convention, where great talent and ingenuity was displayed in the debate, the point was so considered, and the objection rested on that ground; the consequence of adoption was supposed to be an unequal strengthening of the commercial parts of the Union. So deeply impressed was President WASHINGTON with the importance of a navy, and so true to his duty and just claims of commerce for protection, that he could not consent to quit his high station in the public councils without placing on record his sentiments for the good of his country—this he did in his speech to the Fourth Congress (second session) in language that well attests his wisdom and paternal care and solicitude for his country. He recommended and urged the policy of a navy in the strongest terms, and I will not believe that the parting lesson of that great and good man will be lost to his country—there is certainly too much respect for his memory to disregard his solemn advice and counsel on any subject. In this policy Mr. JEFFERSON also concurred at a period most auspicious to fair inquiry and dispassionate judgment; it was before the tempest of party arose, to obscure the great luminary of truth and blacken the political horizon.

But it is now said that agriculture, the farming interest, is not concerned in the question of a navy; that it can receive no benefit; that we have no commerce to protect. This is strange language. Need I here, sir, refer to first principles, common maxims, to show how inseparable are commerce and agriculture; that they are embarked in one common bottom and must stand or fall together? How is it possible that the rich tide of commerce should not reach and gladden our fields? What barrier is to oppose; what partition wall to separate? How is the sun of prosperity to shine on one portion of the community and not on the other? Commerce multiplies your towns and cities, and your towns, and cities both consume and export the products of the soil. History, from the earliest period, and in all countries, attests, in a manner not to be mistaken, the influence of commerce. Surely, sir, commerce can never be indifferent to the farming interest. What have we seen in this Hall within a very few days? A proposition to restrict the export trade was rejected once, again and again, and by whom? I answer, by farmers. It is impossible to mistake the springs of action, which move everything and put everything in opposition to rest. What may be the sentiments of farmers in the gentleman's State (Mr. McKEE) I cannot say, but the farmers of New York, not a little exceeding in numbers and falling not short, I trust, in a knowledge of their interests, call loudly for a navy; they insist on naval protection as pledged to them by the compact; they claim the bond of you; they strengthen the claim by pointing to the heavy contribution to your Treasury, from the port of New York, amounting for several years past, to about one-third of the whole revenue of the Union—a revenue they would never have yielded to this Government but from the fullest confidence that the tax on commerce would be applied to its protection. Had the impost of New York been retained by that State, the State would, before this, have been able to build a navy superior to the present naval force of the Union, and the known sentiments of her citizens would have imparted to the Government the necessary disposition. It is impossible not to see that, could that State have foreseen the course of the Government in relation to a navy, the objection to a relinquishment of the impost would have been greatly strengthened, and the adoption of the Constitution put in great jeopardy. It was best perhaps that the future was hidden from them; the advocates of the Constitution, great and powerful as they were, had sufficient obstacles to contend with. But it is objected, that our ships-of-the-line, few in number, will be overwhelmed by the British Navy. I answer, are not our frigates equally exposed? Are not our ships-of-the-line as well matched against theirs, the battle as equal and fair, as between our frigates and theirs? If such are the best arguments against this bill, weak indeed must be the defence.

It is further objected, that there is not sufficient seasoned timber on hand for four seventy-fours. On this point every gentleman must satisfy himself; my information, derived from a source entitled to credit, leads me to the conclusion, that the deficiency of timber will not be considerable, and that the building of the ships may with propriety be commenced, and that what little is wanted may be procured in the progress of the work. It is obvious that this objection is urged not for its appropriate effect, the reduction of the number of ships to the quantity of timber, but to defeat entirely the object of the bill as to the ships-of-the-line; the objection flows from a source far beyond the alleged cause or justification.

I will not, sir, longer trespass on the patience of the Committee; if gentlemen are not satisfied, that the objections and argument heretofore relied on against a navy are invalid and groundless; that they are swept away by the events upon the ocean of the last three months, nothing which I can say can remove those objections. If the motion to expunge the provision for ships-of-the-line from the bill shall prevail, we must kiss the rod, hard as it may be on the commercial States.

MR. WIDGERY.—Mr. Chairman, it will be recollected that I was last session of Congress opposed to the building of seventy-fours, until we had got more frigates. I have been rather opposed to them in the Committee of Naval Affairs, not because I was opposed to an augmentation of the Navy, but because I thought it more to the advantage of the country to build frigates and sloops of war at present; and if, hereafter, when we have sailors plenty to man the large ships with, it should be thought best to have larger ships, it may be very well to build them; but, at present, our resources are inadequate to build the seventy-fours and the ten frigates, and say eight or ten sloops of war, which are absolutely necessary for the protection of our seacoast, in order to keep off the British gun-brigs or privateers. The ships-of-the-line will not answer this purpose, when they are at sea; they must keep deep water; they cannot, with safety, follow in under the land those small vessels which annoy our coasters, and capture them all along shore. Within a few days, I have accounts of a small privateer, of eight guns, having captured twenty or thirty sail of coasting vessels. Sir, it is a sight to see a public armed ship of the United States anywhere on our shore to the eastward of Boston—a seacoast of 200 miles—when the enemy can take everything that passes out to sea, and a country in which there are the best of ship-harbors, where they might cruise with safety, always having a harbor handy to run into. I cannot feel willing to build seventy-fours, to the exclusion of the smaller ships, of which we are so much in want at this time. If you had the money in your chest, and all ready for the building four seventy-fours, and all the timber in the yard—which you have not—still I should have doubts on my mind as to the propriety of those heavy ships. Say, if you please, that you had those ships built, could you send them to sea? I presume not; if at war with England, because she would always blockade your harbors wherever they were; and if you sent them out, perhaps you would never have to man them again; not because our ships in single combat are not a match for her's, but, because they have more ships than they know what to do with; they would always outnumber you at sea, and they would be able to come up with and capture your four ships. But, for what purpose are you to send them out? Certainly, not to take merchantmen. They are not calculated for that purpose, unless you had more than four of them. In case you had a number sufficient to intercept their East India fleet, which, generally, are under strong convoys of heavy ships, then it might be an object to send them to sea. If you are to keep them in port, for the purpose of harbor defence, you must always keep them manned; it will be too late to man them after the enemy comes in sight. And there is, in my mind, another difficulty: In the manning these heavy ships, you will have to impress men to go on board of them, or raise the wages up to what is given in a merchant ship; because the sailors will not be willing to go on board large ships, when they have no chance for prize money. On the other hand, they will be very willing to enter on board cruising ships, such as frigates or sloops of war, in hopes of taking prizes; and you have not, at present, a sufficient number of sailors to man what smaller vessels we want. If you build frigates and sloops of war, they can be furnished without your advancing the money; the merchants will build them, and loan them to the Government. The frigates and smaller vessels can be put afloat in six months from the time they are agreed for; and your ships-of-the-line will not be finished in less than two years; and if they do not cost 30 per cent. more than they are calculated at, I will dare pay all I am worth towards them for nothing. I am willing to go for almost any number of frigates, because I know you can have them built without advancing a dollar until they are ready for service, and because I am convinced they are most for our interest. Popular opinion, I know, has great weight at times; let us not be carried off on the wings of enthusiasm; we are at present at very great expense, and we ought to act prudently with our finances, or they will soon become low. At the same time, I cannot agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, who says he is opposed to any augmentation of the Navy, and asks if you are willing to tax the planters for the building a navy and the protection of the merchant? Sir, will not the same reasoning apply against the maritime towns being taxed to support the army of 10,000 men in the West? Gentlemen say, stay on shore, and you will be safe. Sir, may we not, in return, say to the gentlemen who are settling the cheap lands of the interior, keep among us; go not into the Indian country; we cannot be taxed to defend you. This reasoning will apply with as much force against the interior as theirs does against the Atlantic towns. Sir, we are all one people, and, in order to remain so, we must be willing to defend at all points.

Mr. BASSETT spoke several times in the course of the debate. The following is the substance of the whole of his remarks:—He said, on rising, that it was with no feigned diffidence that he addressed the House. I shall, said he, have credit with every one in the assertion that I am most anxious that the proposition I have made should succeed. Must I not, then, deplore the feebleness of voice, the want of force, of manner, and promptness of mind and thought, which limit me? But I shall feel compensated if the House will, in heart, join me in regretting that a cause worthy of the first of advocates has fallen into such puny hands. For the cause, then, will they hear me, and for their country's good will they improve each hint I may let fall, by their better judgment. It is true, sir, we have little experience—I cannot boast of naval knowledge in our land—but, yet, we are not quite deficient. Let it be remembered, that it is on the first principles that we are to decide; that we are to mark the outlines only, which depend much on general reasoning, and, in doing which, we may resort to the experience of others. I will follow (though with unequal step) the course taken by my predecessor last year, and, on the question to fill this blank, bring the whole subject before the Committee. It will be assumed, as then proved, that protection is due to every national right, which cannot be estimated by pecuniary calculation, but must be tested by national ability only to defend and protect them. To the mode of effecting so desirable an object, I shall confine myself. The report has assumed it as a principle almost of instinct to oppose like to like, and so says the history of man, whom we find ever availing himself of the improvements of his assailant for self-defence. Hence has the art of war become to all nations the most interesting science, and no citizen is more estimable than he who can direct the national force with most efficiency. The importance of a naval force is amply attested on record. I will first, sir, point you to the conflicts between the rival Republics of Rome and Carthage, and ask you to remember the agency that their vessels had in them. Had the Romans confined themselves to the land, never had Carthage been destroyed. The history of Europe, from Venice to Great Britain, is too familiar to all who hear me, to require reference to particulars. It is sufficient for me to call attention to the effect of naval power, as it passed from nation to nation. What was the power of Venice and Genoa when they led the van of naval power? How quickly did the sceptre of Portugal rise, as she assumed a station on the ocean! how sink as she lost her naval preponderance! How did a navy once support the United Provinces! and how is it now the salvation of Great Britain! It is then a fact, that a naval armament gives effect to the power of a nation, as does the musket and bayonet, the cannon and the mortar. And how, sir, is it attempted to rebut this fact? By showing a physical disability in the country to avail itself of this force? No. For then would they be rebutted by the extent of our coasts, by the materials for ship-building, (so ample,) and the known habits and genius of our countrymen, as each day is evincing. And here, sir, I wish I could follow up the beautiful figure of my friend, who, on a former occasion, showed you our Continent, extending to either ocean, with the finger of Munificence pointing to the goodly heritage.

We have then these facts: that a navy is a powerful means of national operation; that our local situation is fitted for its use; and that we have the necessary materials. To which it is objected that your infant Navy must be opposed to one which has reached the full manhood of power on the ocean. I admit it. But shall we therefore abandon the ocean, yield our birthright, our goodly heritage, without a struggle? Or, shall we not rather, deducing argument from example, like the gallant Captain Hull, avoid their fleets and capture their single ships.

I am aware that habit impels some to be fearful on this subject, and the experience of the past will not convince them. With diffidence, therefore, do I refer to the efficiency of twelve ships-of-the-line and twenty frigates, as demonstrated last session. Let me ask of gentlemen who thus think, who thus feel, to examine the extent of their argument. Does it not go, not only to the abandonment of the ocean, but to the seacoast also? I shall trust to former statements for the magnitude of this sacrifice, with the observation, that abandoning the ocean involves the loss of one million four hundred thousand tons of shipping; and that in giving up the coasts, you lose a valuable portion of your soil, and some of your fairest cities. I will not dwell on the magnitude of this sacrifice, because I cannot believe that Americans will abandon any right which there is a prospect to maintain. I cannot, I admit, answer as conclusively the objection, that much time will be passed before this force can be procured; yet, I believe, that a mind which relied on that objection, might be satisfied that late preparation is better than none. Nor could a mind, so circumstanced, fail to see, that, while making preparation, you come every day nearer your object; in neglecting it, you are every day further from it, and you are, in neglecting it, blending ultimate loss with temporary sacrifice.

Mr. Chairman, is it for an infant nation, or a popular Government, to be deterred by the want of preparation? What is it that the youth has not to prepare, or when was it that a popular Government taxed itself with previous preparation? But why this argument of despair? What were your preparations for the Revolutionary war, and when made? After an army was in your country. Yet were they then made, and effectually made. By the bravery of our fathers our soil was secured; on us it rests to secure our rights on the water, common to every independent nation, and as clearly ours as they are essential to our interests. What is this argument of infancy? Had not the Navy of Great Britain a beginning? Yes. There was a time when Britain had no ship. What then? She was invaded, and more, she was conquered. At this day her wooden walls, as they are proverbially called, are her defence and protection. Is it admitted that the British fleet secures her from attack? If so, would not a fleet secure us from attack also? But we have it not. Is it not then our duty, as guardians of the public interest, to provide this powerful, this necessary means of defence? But some are alarmed at the cost. Permit me to recur to the calculation of the last year. And first, as to the information derived from British experience, whose example may be taken as precedent on maritime subjects; at least they make a powerful argument, where they are rejected as full proof. In recurring to British estimates, it certainly was unexpected to the American eye to see the same sum charged for a soldier as for a sailor, viz: — dollars per month; and as unexpected, on investigating the British expenditures for a series of years, to find that the appropriations for the Navy are found less than those for the Army, as will be seen by reference to the Annual Register. In corroboration of this is our own history, as appears from the calculations made by my predecessor, of which I will avail myself.

Is it not then demonstrated by foreign and domestic experience, that a naval force is the cheapest the nation can resort to for defence and protection? Is it not also proved, that a force believed to be competent, might be obtained at a sum greatly within the means of the Government—say twelve millions of dollars—or a fourth less than the ordinary amount of revenue for a year in good times? Test this subject in another way. The cost of your Navy, twelve millions; give up the ocean, and you lose, for one item, one million four hundred thousand tons of shipping, which, at fifty dollars the ton, would be worth five times the sum. Yet that would unquestionably be the least item in the account, because that would be but one loss, while that of your coasting, and other trade, would swell into a great annual amount, and be as great a sacrifice of convenience as profit. Nor is such a conclusion the less to be deprecated, because it is difficult to foresee all the evils which must result from the abandonment of one essential right of an independent nation. I know it may be said by those who view this subject differently from me, that they do not mean to abandon the ocean. It is, then, for them to show the difference between not abandoning a right, and not defending it; for I cannot believe that any gentleman will contend that the national defence shall be left to privateers. They have most justly been considered an aid to the national arm, but Heaven forbid that they should be relied on as principal. A private arm, with power to shield the nation, is what I could not contemplate without terror. I cannot believe it necessary to pursue this argument.

To return then: The force adequate to the defence of our seas would cost twelve millions. I will not say that this whole expense ought to be incurred in one year; indeed, it ought to be remarked, that of the twenty frigates, nearly eight are ready for service. Let the principle be yielded, and we can then enter on the calculation as to the portion which may be procured each year. The decision, too, would, in my judgment, be the strongest inducement to the enemy to make peace when they saw that you were progressing to a force which they could not meet. If, indeed, the force which has been named was not altogether adequate to the object of defending your own waters, you would find; having that force, that you could make any small addition that was requisite without difficulty. In reference to the opinions of others, in some measure, did the select committee determine on the number of ships, and their force, to be procured this year. Thus, if the first blanks are filled with four seventy-six-gun ships, they cost, per estimate, $333,000, and will require an appropriation of $1,332,000. If the other blank be filled with six thirty-eight gun ships, which, by estimate, cost $220,000, the requisite appropriation for them will be $1,320,000. For the sloops of war, the last blank I have calculated at 61,200, which would require an appropriation of $367,200; which, with the necessary appropriation for the four frigates ordered to be rebuilt last year, viz: the Philadelphia, New York, General Greene, and Boston, will amount to $3,500,000. This would give you four seventy-sixes and eighteen frigates, mostly of the best size. Compare the efficiency of that force with the interest of three millions and a half, the cost, and you cannot but be gratified with the result. I say, Mr. Chairman, the interest; because, though it was not in the province of the select committee to look out the ways and means, yet was it so interested as to their object, that they could but ask how was the money to be had; and they were satisfied that three millions and a half could, with facility, be loaned for Navy purposes. I state this with no view to limit the ways and means, but only that until the subject is given them to provide for, the House might not be embarrassed with the difficulty of money.

With the humble hope that the views of the committee have been shown to be at least most reasonable, if not most correct, I beg leave to say a few words as to the different kinds of vessels proposed. I will not ask that the Clerk should read that excellent letter from Captain Stewart, because I presume every gentleman who wishes information has read it more than once. From that, and the other documents, the committee thought themselves warranted in recommending four seventy-six-gun ships. In addition to the sufficient reasons offered there, that a large ship, with fewer men and a less cost, will be more efficient than small ones, by the table A it is most conclusively evinced, that a seventy-six, at one round, throws on the enemy four pounds fourteen ounces of ball for each man; whereas, the gunboat throws only ten ounces. I only give the extremes, that the argument may be the more readily taken. Here, too, we have the fact, that six hundred and fifty men are sufficient for a seventy-six, while four hundred and twenty are required for a frigate. The annual expense is, for the large ship, $202,110; for the frigate, $110,000. While in action, the larger ship is equal or superior to three frigates. To support this calculation by figures, we have the opinions of Captains Hull, Stewart, and Morris; and Mr. Hamilton says, that all the officers in service concur in the opinion; and I am told that such is the real history of naval conflicts. Mr. Hamilton mentions one, and Captain Stewart mentions another, of four French frigates attacking a British seventy-four, of which one was sunk, two taken, and the other run off. I find, in the British Annual Register, two cases, which I will read.

I owe it to the House to say, that I am told, that, in the East Indies, there was a novel instance wherein two French frigates did attack a seventy-four, and carried her; but as accident sometimes decides the fate of conflicts, I would suppose it must have been so then. It is, to say the least of it, a decision against physical force. The other cases are in confirmation of the physical power. The like result was evinced in the affair between the President and the Little Belt, and in the contest between the Essex and the Alert. I am aware that some most respectable opinions are in favor of frigates; but why are they in favor of frigates? Because they say that they are the best cruisers; and to that opinion I subscribe; and, in conformity with that opinion, have those who have thought most on the subject always recommended a large proportion of frigates. The present system contemplates eighteen to four; certainly a sufficient proportion to avail yourselves of all the advantages of cruising; while, by taking the four seventy-sixes into your service, you provide a physical force equal in all to thirty frigates. I cannot but think that it is demonstrated that this gives a force equal to thirty frigates. Moreover, for the seventy-sixes, we have the frames nearly for four, and they can, I have been told, be got ready for sea sooner than frigates.

Suppose, however, that our calculations should prove incorrect, what will be the loss of a million or two of dollars? whereas, if it gives partial security to our waters, the gain will be many millions; if it brings us peace one year sooner, the greater still will be your gain; and, my word for it, the ordering only of these large ships will be the strongest peace argument you can sound into the ears of the British Ministry. I feel most sensibly the influence of the argument that if we had these ships now there might be no objection to the experiment; but before we could build them, peace will take place, and they will be useless. Good Heaven! and is the peace, the security of our country, to be thus placed on the hazard of the time when it may please our enemy to give us peace. This was the argument last year! is now used, and will be brought up again and again, until the guardian genius of America shall dispel the enchanting influence of habit, and restore to the natural laws of physical force their due weight in the minds of Congress. It is true that it will take time to build ships, but if we have shown you, as I trust we have, the necessity and use of these ships, the argument ought to be the stronger, the sooner ought you to be preparing them. The time when is certainly most important, and I find the opinions of experienced men to be, that the frames of the seventy-sixes being already seasoned, they may be built in twelve months; that the frames for the large frigates not being ready, they could not be built under eighteen months; for the sloops of war, it is calculated that they might be procured on contract, and that our large towns would supply good materials for them, and from six to ten months will, it is hoped, put them to sea. This view is corroborated by a memorandum taken by a man of experience from the British dockyards. It was suggested to the select committee, that one, two, or more of the frigates might be contracted for. It was thought unwise to limit the Government, but it is to be hoped that they will purchase no old vessel, unless it be under very particular circumstances indeed, and when they build by contract that they will do it under the inspection of an agent.

It is cause of some exultation to me, that our naval men, where the opportunity is afforded them, give the example to prove our theory. As I am told, orders were sent from Washington in September to Captain Chauncey, then at New York, who made his preparation, took his workmen with him to the Lakes, and some days since we had the account that he had built and launched, before November was out, a frigate of twenty-six guns. The gallant Chauncey enables me to present an argument that would, could I do it justice, I am sure, have much weight. Will any gentleman regret that this twenty-six gun ship has been built, though the mastery of the Lakes has been acquired without it? Neither shall we regret the building the seventy-sixes, though peace, which God send, should come before they are launched. There is yet one other objection too important to be passed over, though it was on a former occasion so ably canvassed. It is the difficulty of getting seamen. That difficulty exists, I do admit. Yet is not the difficulty insurmountable. Here again I avail myself of the illustrations of my friend from South Carolina.

Let me add that it is an admitted fact, that our ships are better manned than the British, and though the high price of seamen's wages may be a cause of temporary difficulty, yet it will have a twofold operation. In a country like ours, where at least thirty thousand men are yearly growing into service, the temptation of thirty and forty dollars per month, whilst ordinary labor is seven or eight; will soon swell the list of your seamen to equal any demand. It is to be remarked, that able seamen make all the difficulty, and the public service alone in the course of the year greatly removes the difficulty, as many who enter as ordinary seamen will in that time be able seamen. It appears from the documents, that in 1798-9 and 1800, that you had in service four thousand able seamen. Taking them at one-third, and it gives you, in twenty-two thousand, the deficit of one thousand able seamen only, for manning twelve seventy-sixes and twenty frigates, a deficiency which every one will see must be more than made up when compared with the increase of American tonnage since 1798, or on comparison with the increase of population. It is due to this subject also to observe, that though there be now a difficulty in getting seamen, it is the result of the number of privateers that have fitted out, and which in the ordinary course of things may be supposed to lessen. With some little delay we have hitherto manned our ships, and as said before, better than the British. But what I trust will be conclusive on this part of the argument is, that not the fact but presumption is brought against us, and, where so great an interest is at hazard, I will not suppose that surmise or doubt will be allowed to defeat the best digested plan. Such I must be allowed to consider that presented to the view of the House and the nation by my friend from South Carolina. I would ask of those who differ with me on this subject, to look well to the issue at stake: To abandon the ocean sweeps by the board all the fishing and shipping interests of America, and will wither the luxuriant tendrils of Eastern manufactures, to whose growth and strength the facility of transportation is so essential. More than half the product of the farmer is gone, if his heavy productions cannot be water-borne to market. The cotton of the South depends much on the facility of carriage for its value. The sugar of Louisiana, but for the highway of the Atlantic, would reach us at the most heavy cost, if at all. Our ships being gone, what need will there be for the hemp or canvass of Kentucky? Thus East, West, North and South, will feel as if the palsy was on them the moment you abandon the ocean. If, then, there was only a hope that the plan offered would secure this right, I would entreat of the patriotism of the American Congress not to take away even that hope. How much better it is than hope, let the earnest we have in the gallant conduct of Captains Hull and Jones, and the well-directed fire of the President and the Essex, declare. The physical force is placed before you; it is yours, ye guardians of the American people, to provide the force. The Constitution has placed the direction in the hands of the Executive, and the event is in the hands of Heaven. The first duty, then, is ours to provide the force; and I should think myself most fortunate, could I be the instrument to gain so much for my country as an undivided vote on this question. And why? Would it be the pride of personal or national correctness?

Neither from a higher source would my pleasure be drawn. It is the knowledge of the weight that such a vote would give my country in all its foreign intercourse; and that whether it be viewed in relation to the nation now our enemy, or whether you view it in relation to future and possible conflicts with the Gallican chief; or if, descending, you look only to the pigmy Power who the other day, in the person of your officer, so grossly insulted you—in any or all these views, an undivided vote to prepare a force as efficient as that now presented you, would keep your peace or defend you at war—would save you from insult, or chastise it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has said, this was taking a fatal leap. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, why fatal? Is it fatal because most efficient against your enemy, or is it fatal from the amount of the cost, that is, two million and a half of dollars? or is it fatal because it is the most republican force, or because it excludes from your seaports and seacoasts the bristling rampart of bayonets? To my mind, no political axiom is more true than that republican safety can be rather trusted to a naval than a land force, to seventy-fours than regiments. The gentleman has again referred to the difficulty of manning your ships, and deems impressment indispensable. Sir, I admit the weakness of our nation, and lament it too. Yet I cannot believe that the hard hand of tyranny is essential to their well-being; and I regret that in an assembly of freemen, that this, the most if not the only detestable example England has set us as to a navy, should be so much relied on. Look to the fact, that in five years forty-two thousand seamen deserted from the British navy. Look to the fact, that their prisoners require to be committed to return to their own country. It is with no little pride that I call the attention of the gentleman and the committee to our gallery. Did a British gallery ever exhibit such a spectacle? No, a seaman there is a slave, and seldom puts his foot on shore but under the guard of an officer. Let us therefore be cautious in admitting that though Great Britain has been most successful, that she owes it to the hard, to the iron-hand of impressment. It would not be difficult to find in her naval institutions other principles to which the mind would delight to attribute her superiority, rather than that from which we cannot but turn in disgust.

Mr. Stow said he should not consider the motion made by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SEYBERT) as going to defeat the main object of the bill, which was a liberal increase of the Navy, because he understood his intention to be to move a larger number of frigates if the clause for seventy-fours should be stricken out. The question then he should consider as simply whether it was best at present to build any ships-of-the-line, or to confine our exertions to frigates only? He said his own opinions had leaned pretty strongly to the latter side till, as a member of the Navy Committee, he had been led to a more careful examination of the subject; and he confessed that that examination had fully convinced him of the utility, and he might say necessity, of building some line of battle ships. The propriety of building them, as well as a proportion of lighter ships, grew out of the different objects to which they were to be applied. There could be no doubt of the superior advantages of frigates and sloops of war when employed in cruising against our enemy's commerce, but whenever the object is to repel a powerful force, ships-of-the-line ought to be resorted to. They form batteries infinitely more effective in proportion to their expense than frigates. To illustrate this—the cost of a seventy-four is less than one-third more than that of a forty-four gun frigate, yet the force is as three to one, or, according to the lowest estimate I have heard, as two to one. This is easily explained when we consider that to make a seventy-four is little more than adding another deck to a large frigate. It would then appear evident, that unless we resorted to this kind of force, we should fight our enemy on the most unequal terms. She could at any time lay a few heavy ships at the mouths of our harbors and in our narrow waters, and thus effectually destroy not only our foreign trade, but what was of infinitely more importance, she could destroy the whole of our coasting trade.

Further, said Mr. S., knowing that we have no powerful ships, she can easily protect by convoy all her valuable fleets; but if we had four ships-of-the-line she would be driven to the enormous expense of convoying every fleet of merchantmen sailing to any part of America by five or six seventy-fours, or they would be exposed to capture by our fleet.

But, said Mr. S., it is objected that they would be blockaded. This objection was equally against frigates, but he was perfectly willing to put it upon that ground, that Great Britain would attempt to blockade them. What then would be the case? She must employ six blockading ships, supported at an enormous expense, at such a distance; and as had been fully shown by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHEVES,) last year, six more ships at least must be occupied in preparing and sailing to replace the first six—thus employing twelve ships to four. And after all, the attempt to confine our ships would frequently be rendered abortive by storms. Again, it has been objected that we had no harbors south of Montauk Point, in which, if pursued, our ships could take shelter. If by this was meant barely that we had no harbor properly fortified, he admitted it was true; and it was also equally true as applied to our heavy frigates; but if it was meant that there was no harbor in which ships could enter that was capable of being properly defended, it was entirely erroneous. For many such there were, and where sufficient works could be erected in a few months.

Mr. S. said a strong reason for building seventy-fours and to which he particularly requested the attention of the Committee, grew out of the state of our preparation. We have timber for four seventy-fours, seasoned and ready for use, which could not be applied to frigates, without great loss. And this explained the fact, that we could build seventy-fours sooner than frigates, unless the timber thus provided should be cut up, which, after years of deliberate preparation for seventy-fours, would appear like children's play. He said in a case of this kind, he thought great respect was due to experience. That many years ago all the ships of war belonging to the nations of Europe were small, but that, without one exception, they had resorted to a certain proportion of heavy ships. From this circumstance, as well as from the uniform opinion of our own officers, he inferred that these were the most conclusive reasons in favor of them.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the seventy-fours, and negatived. The Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, December 18.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill authorizing an increase of the capital stock of the Bank of Washington; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a resolution of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, approbatory of the conduct of the General Government in declaring war against Great Britain.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the estimates of appropriations necessary for the service of the year 1813; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate "approving the report of the Commissioners appointed by the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle the exterior line of the public land at West Point, in the State of New York," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

REMISSION OF FINES, &c.

Mr. QUINCY said it would be recollected that in the course of the debate the other day on the subject of the Merchants' Bonds, he had taken occasion to advert to the principles adopted by the Treasury Department in relation to the execution of the laws authorizing the remission of certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures. He had then stated that he considered those principles not to be justified by the terms of the law, and to be essentially opposed to the principles of liberty and the safety of the citizen. A gentleman from South Carolina had taken occasion to controvert the provisions laid down, and to doubt whether further examination would not prove an error in the statement. Mr. Q. said he had then pledged himself to the House to bring forward a resolution for the purpose of inquiry. To redeem that pledge, he now proposed to introduce a resolution. But that pledge was not his sole inducement. Without such a pledge, he said, it had been his intention to have moved a resolution for such an investigation of this subject as the nature of it appeared to him to require. As the House were already apprized of his views, he said he would not further intrude on their patience than to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the principles and practice adopted by the Treasury Department in relation to the revenue laws, and to the mitigating or remitting the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, accruing under the same, and that they be instructed to report thereon to the House.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE observed that the whole bearing of a resolution could not be at once comprehended by hearing it read from the Chair; but, from his understanding of this resolve, the committee to be appointed under it would perform their duty by simply stating the principles now practised on, without going back to the practice from the commencement of the Government. As the object of the gentleman's observations the other day appeared to be to impress the House with a belief that the practice recently adopted at the Treasury varied from that originally adopted in that department; and as it was his wish, Mr. B. said, to have both brought before the public, he wished the gentleman to permit this resolution to lie on the table until to-morrow, that he might have an opportunity to look into the subject, and make the motion broader than it now appeared to him to be.

Mr. QUINCY said, if the object of the gentleman was to make this resolution broader he should not object to its lying on the table. He would make but a single observation in reply to the gentleman. His intention, Mr. Q. said, had been totally mistaken if it was supposed that he considered the circumstance of the deviation from the old construction as very material. He had stated that it had been proved to his own satisfaction that a new practice had taken place in the Treasury Department. But, new or old, it was a practice, let it have been adopted when and by whom it will, essentially contrary to the principles of civil liberty.

The resolution was then ordered to lie on the table.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The House again resolved itself in a Committee of the Whole on the bill to increase the Navy of the United States.

Mr. HARPER moved to amend the bill by striking out "four" and inserting "two" ships-of-the-line, with a view thereafter to move to amend the bill so as to provide for two additional frigates and six sloops of war.

Mr. WINGERY again spoke against the seventy-fours, and in favor of frigates and sloops of war.

Mr. HARPER's motion was negatived.—For the amendment 45, against it 51.

Mr. CUTTS then moved to strike out the seventy-fours, with a view to increase the number of frigates to be built to ten, and to add a number of sloops of war.

Mr. C. spoke at considerable length in support of his motion, and in favor of frigates and sloops of war in preference to seventy-four gun ships.

Mr. SEYBERT spoke again, questioning the correctness of the estimates for seventy-fours. He was a friend to a gradual increase of the Navy, and it was by a gradual increase only that we could become a naval power.

Mr. BASSETT spoke at great length in support of the bill, and in reply to Mr. CUTTS's remarks and objections to the seventy-fours.

Mr. CUTTS replied.

The question was then taken on striking out the provision respecting seventy-fours, and was carried.—For the amendment 56, against it 53.

Mr. CUTTS moved an amendment authorizing the building of ten ships of war, of forty-four guns, and ten sloops of war.—Motion lost by a great majority.

After some conversation as to the proper mode of proceeding in this case, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. BACON then moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of this bill, with a view to refer it to the Naval Committee.

Before the question was decided, however, the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 21.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the petitions of J. A. Chevallie, attorney of Amelie Eugene de Beaumarchais, presented on the 24th of December, 1805, and 2d of April, 1806, together with all the documents concerning the said claim, were referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the amount of duties and drawbacks on goods imported into, and exported from, the United States, during the years 1809, 1810, and 1811; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "authorizing the admission, under certain circumstances, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States of America, with their cargoes, from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope," in which bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State of Louisiana, enclosing copies of the credentials of Thomas B. Robertson, as a member of the House of Representatives in the present and succeeding Congress from that State.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, ratifying and confirming the amendment proposed by Congress to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the acceptance, on the part of citizens of the United States, of titles of nobility or honor from any foreign Power; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CAPTURES AND PENSIONS.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, presented a bill relating to captures; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next. The bill is as follows:

A Bill relating to captures.

Be it enacted, &c., That where any ship or vessel in the service of the United States shall have captured, or may hereafter capture, a ship or vessel belonging to an enemy, of equal or inferior force, and it shall become necessary to destroy such prize to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy, or for the security of such ship or vessel so in the service of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby required to issue his commission to one or more fit person or persons, who, on the best evidence that can be procured, shall proceed to estimate the value of such ship or vessel, prize as aforesaid, in the port into which the capturing vessel shall first enter, and make return on oath of said estimate or valuation to the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy shall thereon proceed to apportion the sum, which shall be equal to one-half the said valuation or estimate, as prize money, among the officers and crew making such capture, and cause the same to be paid to them accordingly.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That each commissioned officer shall receive six dollars per day for each day he shall be employed in making the aforesaid estimate: Provided, His compensation shall in no case exceed — dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every captain or commanding officer of any vessel in the service of the United States immediately on his coming into port, after having captured a ship or vessel of equal or superior force, shall make report thereof to the Secretary of the Navy, describing particularly the size and equipment of the ship or vessel so destroyed, and the nature and extent of the damage done her in the action, as also the causes and inducements for destroying his prize, which report, in part, shall be received as evidence by the commissioners aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy shall cause the account of the money so by him ordered to be paid, to be settled at the end of one year, and all the unclaimed dividends he shall cause to be paid over to the Navy Hospital Fund.

Mr. BASSETT, from the same committee, also presented a bill regulating pensions to persons on board private armed ships; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next. The bill is as follows:

A Bill regulating pensions to persons on board private armed ships.

Be it enacted, &c., That the two and a half per centum reserved in the hands of the Collectors and Consuls by the act of June, eighteen hundred and twelve, entitled "An act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," shall be paid into the Treasury, under the like regulations provided for other public money, and shall constitute a fund for the purposes of this act, and such other purposes as Congress may direct, for the aid and comfort of the seamen of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized and required to place on the pension list, under the like regulations and restrictions as are used in relation to the Navy of the United States, any officer or seamen who, on board of any private armed ship or vessel, bearing a commission or letter of marque, shall have been, in the line of duty, wounded or otherwise disabled; if an officer, allowing him one-half his monthly pay for the greater disability, and so in proportion; and if a seaman, or acting as a marine, the sum of six dollars per month for the greater disability, and so in proportion; which several pensions shall be paid, by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, out of the fund above provided.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the commanding officer of every vessel having a commission, or letters of marque and reprisal, shall enter in his journal the name and rank of any officer, and the name of any seamen who, during his cruise, shall, in the line of his duty, have been wounded or disabled, describing the manner and extent, as far as practicable, of such wound or disability.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every collector shall transmit quarterly to the Secretary of the Navy a transcript of such journals as may have been reported to him, so far as they give a list of the officers and crew, and the description of wounds and disabilities, the better to enable the Secretary to decide on claims for pensions.

DUTIES ON PRIZE GOODS.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit certain fines, penalties and forfeitures, reported the same with amendments, the principal one of which is to strike out the words "and the dependencies thereof," so as to exclude from the operation of the bill, the cases of goods brought in from Canada, &c.—The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. C. also introduced the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred so much of the petition of the owners and agents of sundry private armed vessels fitted out of the port of New York, as prays the reduction of the duties on prize goods, and the petitions of sundry owners of private armed vessels fitted out of the port of Boston, and of sundry owners of like vessels fitted out of the ports of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia, also praying a reduction of the duties on prize goods, report:

That a letter from John Ferguson and John L. Laurence, agents for the petitioners from New York, and a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, both addressed to the chairman of the committee, and which accompany this report, contain all the facts and views which will probably be found material in the examination and consideration of this subject; and that this committee, having maturely considered them, are of opinion, that a reduction of the duties on prize goods, without embracing, at the same time, all importations made in the prosecution of the ordinary commerce of the country, cannot, consistently with sound policy and rational legislation, be made, and that a general reduction would diminish a revenue, where it does not distress the consumer, and would not produce any material increase of gain to the captors. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolve:

DECEMBER, 1812.

Duties on Prize Goods.

H. OF R.

Resolved. That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

Documents referred to in the above report.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23, 1812.

SIR: We take the liberty of enclosing to you, for the inspection of the Committee of Ways and Means, sundry papers connected with the application by the owners of privateers in New York, for a reduction of duties on prize goods. They are as follow:

No. 1, exhibits the proceeds of the schooner Venus and cargo, captured by the privateer Teazer.

No. 2, is a statement of the cost of the privateers General Armstrong and Governor Tompkins.

No. 3, contains extracts of letters from several privateer agents.

The Committee of Ways and Means are (including the accompanying documents) in possession of three statements of prize sales, where the property was, in each case, of a different character from the others. The cargo of the New Liverpool consisted (contrary to our impressions when before the committee) altogether of wine, amounting to 27,959 gallons, whereon the duty was 46 cents per gallon, which consumed more than one-half of the proceeds of vessel and cargo, and, connected with the other charges, left the owners of the privateer about one-sixth of the captured property. The Industry was laden with 152 bbls. salmon; and the benevolent intentions of the privateersmen to restore to an indigent owner the amount of her loss, terminated, in consequence of the high duties and charges, in an inability to present her with more than a paltry sum, scarcely worth her acceptance. The Venus had a cargo of rum, sugar, fruit, and preserves, which produced $17,637 68, and was charged with duties amounting to $8,287 63. The vessel, being well calculated for a privateer, was bought in by the captors for that business. But, experience teaching them that the profits of private naval warfare are by no means equivalent to the hazard, they have abandoned that intention, and are now offering the Venus for sale in the public newspapers, but cannot find a purchaser.

We would respectfully suggest to the Committee of Ways and Means that great anxiety exists in New York, that Congress may give the question of a reduction of prize duties a speedy decision; which, if favorable, will revive the spirit and zeal, now expiring, with which privateering was undertaken at the commencement of the war; and, if unfavorable, will prevent those who have purchased vessels for warlike enterprises, in which they cannot now dispose of any interest, from incurring losses accumulated under fruitless expectations.

We have taken the liberty of reminding the committee that no naval force of any efficiency can be supported by the Government but at an expense far greater than the amount of the duties of which we pray the remission; and that there is probably no other species of naval armament half so destructive as privateers to the commerce of an enemy.

The employment of a great number of experienced masters of vessels and seamen necessarily engaged in them, whose services could not probably be obtained in any other way, and whose skill and intrepidity produce so much honor to the country, forms another important consideration.

To these may be added, that, in no other way, can the mercantile interest be so effectually united in the support and prosecution of the war, as by offering inducements to the investments of its otherwise unemployed capital in such enterprises.

We are, sir, with great respect, your obedient servants,

JOHN FERGUSON,
JOHN L. LAWRENCE.

Hon. L. CHEVES, Chairman, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 8, 1812.

SIR: The documents in the Treasury do not yet afford any satisfactory information respecting the value of the prizes made by private armed vessels, or the amount of duties derived from that source. In answer to the inquiry of the committee respecting the propriety of diminishing the duties on prize goods, I can only take an abstract view of the subject.

No part of the duties on prize goods ultimately falls on the captors. The duties on importations are paid by the consumers, whether the merchandise be captured by privateers, or regularly imported by merchants. There may be accidental exceptions, arising from such a superabundance of a particular article as will sink its price below the prime cost and charges. It is not believed that this is now the case, and it is very improbable that, during the war, this should be the case, with respect to any species of foreign merchandise whatever. Coffee, which is the most abundant article, pays a duty of ten cents a pound. The price for exportation, in which case no duty is paid, is about six cents; and the price for home consumption is at least sixteen cents.

Indeed, it is evident that a reduction of duties will be of no use to the privateers, unless the merchandise continues to be sold at the same price as if the duties had not been reduced. In order to render the reduction beneficial to the captors of prize goods, the consumers must still pay the same price as heretofore; the only difference being, that the duty thus levied upon them would be paid to the captors, instead of being paid into the Treasury.

The question, therefore, is simply, whether it be necessary and proper to pay from the Treasury to the privateers a bounty equal to the amount of the reduction of duties on prize goods, asked for by the petitioners?

The argument probably urged in favor of that measure is, that the bounty would, by increasing the number of privateers, have a tendency to increase the amount of captures. Thus, supposing that a reduction of duties to one-half of their present rate should produce a double number of captures, the enemy would be annoyed to a double extent, without any loss to the Treasury. But it is not believed that the intended effect would be produced, at least to a degree sufficient to compensate for the loss on the revenue, or to outweigh another forcible objection to this measure.

In order to justify the payment of a bounty, it must be assumed, either that the price at which some captured articles can be sold is so low as not to render it worth the risk to send into port vessels laden with such articles; or that the bounty is necessary for the purpose of encouraging the fitting out of a number of armed vessels sufficient to capture all the enemy's vessels which can be taken by privateers.

The first position is not believed to be correct. There are not any articles constituting the mass of enemies' cargoes, and liable to pay duty, which are not sufficiently valuable to make it an object to capture the vessel and send her into port. Coffee, the article which pays the highest proportionate duty, and the value of which is most reduced, is worth six cents a pound, or one hundred and twenty dollars per ton. But, if the fact was true, the true remedy would be to diminish the duty generally, and not to give an exclusive bounty to the owners and crews of privateers. For if the article be not worth sending in after capture, it must be altogether impossible for the importing merchant to pay its prime cost, freight, and insurance; and, with those charges, to import such an article without considerable loss. As the last position rests on conjecture, it is less susceptible of being conclusively refuted. It appears, however, highly probable, that a greater number of privateers has been and will, without any bounty, continue to be employed than is necessary for the greatest possible annoyance to the enemy's trade.

H. OF R.

All common regular occupations will generally find their own level; and, if left to themselves, the capital and labor employed on each will regulate themselves so as to leave a moderate but adequate profit to the persons respectively engaged in each branch. Some occupations, important to the community at large, may be so unprofitable as not to be pursued to the extent required by the public interest. These form an exception, and may require an extraordinary encouragement from Government. But experience shows, that the occupations where profit depends wholly, or in a great degree, on hazard, are generally overstocked and attract a considerable capital, although there be a certain loss in the aggregate. This is daily exemplified in the case of lotteries, which are filled although there is a certain and acknowledged loss of fifteen per cent. on the whole amount of capital thus laid out by the adventurers. The hope of a prize, the uncertain and improbable chance of an easy, prompt, and great profit, are sufficient inducements to produce that effect. The occupation of privateers is precisely of the same species with respect to hazard and to the chance of rich prizes, and is, at this moment, still more encouraged by the want of employment for the capital and seamen heretofore engaged in ordinary commercial pursuits.

If this view of the subject be correct, it necessarily follows that a bounty may indeed still more increase the number of privateers, but without increasing in any proportionate degree the number of captures; that of existing privateers being already more than sufficient for the quantity of food afforded by the enemy's trade. The only probable effect will therefore be a diminution of revenue, which must be supplied by another tax, and an unprofitable application of the national capital and labor, without inflicting any additional sensible injury on the enemy.

Should, however, the opinion thus formed be considered as erroneous, there is another forcible objection to the mode now proposed of giving an encouragement or bounty. I allude to the temptation and facility which the vicinity of the British colonies affords, of making collusive or pretended captures of British prohibited merchandise. It has been suggested, from a source in which confidence may be placed, that arrangements were already made, or at least contemplated, for that object. A reduction of duties, by increasing the profit, would operate as an insurance on the risk, and assist in defraying the expenses attending the transaction. It seems that, even supposing some additional encouragement to be necessary, it would be preferable to give it in some other shape, which should not be calculated to promote those fraudulent operations.

It may not be irrelevant to state that, it is doubtful whether, by the existing laws, private armed vessels and their prizes are liable to the payment of tonnage duty, and that the seamen thus employed are certainly exempt from the payment of hospital money.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. L. CHEVES, Chairman. &c.

The report was referred to a Committee of the whole House.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. BACON, depending on Friday at the time of adjournment, that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill of this House, and of the bill of the Senate, "to increase the Navy of the United States," and that the said bills be recommended to the Committee on the Naval Establishment—when, Mr. BACON withdrew his said motion, and the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bills.

A motion was made by Mr. HARPER to reconsider the motion for striking out the seventy-fours. He made this motion because he was a friend to an increase of the Navy, and would agree to build seventy-fours, if he could not obtain other descriptions of vessels.

The motion to reconsider the vote was agreed to—54 to 41.

Mr. BACON spoke against this motion. Though in favor of an increase of the Navy, he was opposed to seventy-fours.

Mr. BASSETT spoke in reply, at considerable length.

Mr. GHOLSON spoke generally in favor of an increase of the Navy, and in favor of the bill from the Senate.

Mr. STOW followed in support of seventy-fours.

Mr. TROUP also spoke in favor of seventy-four-gun ships, which he warmly advocated, as well as a general increase of the Navy.

Mr. H. CLAY explained the reasons why, though decidedly in favor of an increase of the Navy, he was opposed to seventy-four-gun ships.

Mr. WINGERY again spoke on the same side of the question.

Mr. CALHOUN spoke at some length in favor of an increase of the Navy on general principles, and of even a larger force than was proposed now to be added by the bill.

Mr. ROBERTS spoke in favor of the postponement of this subject, with a view to obtaining further information on the subject of the probable cost of the proposed increase, &c.

Mr. PLEASANTS spoke decidedly in favor of an increase of the Navy, and of the force now proposed to be erased from the bill.

The question was then taken on striking out the seventy-fours, and negatived—For the amendment 52; against it 58.

Mr. H. CLAY proposed then to amend the bill by striking out the word "forthwith," and substituting the following clause: "As soon as suitable materials can be provided therefor;" so that, if the materials were on hand, these vessels might be built; and, if not, that the materials should be first procured. This, he said, would remove a great objection in his mind to the bill, arising from the doubt, whether suitable materials were on hand forthwith to build these vessels.

The motion was then agreed to.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill with the amendment, which, after some objections to it as unnecessary from Mr. REED, was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTS then moved to postpone the further consideration of the report to the first Monday in January, with a view to obtaining an official report on the subject of the timber, and the probable cost which will result from the passage of the bill.

Mr. WIDGERY opposed it, and Mr. MACON supported it.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone, and decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follow—yeas 45, nays 77:

YEAS—Daniel Avery, David Bard, William Barnett, William W. Bibb, Robert Brown, William Butler, Matthew Clay, James Cochran, John Clopton, William Crawford, Roger Davis, Joseph Desha, Samuel Dinsmoor, Elias Earle, William Findley, Meshack Franklin, Felix Grundy, Bolling Hall, Obed Hall, Jacob Hufty, John M. Mr. CUTTS then renewed the motion he had made in Committee of the Whole to amend the bill by striking out the provision respecting seventy-fours, and inserting ten frigates—

When a motion was made, and carried, to adjourn.

TUESDAY, December 22.

The bill from the Senate authorizing the admission, under certain circumstances, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States of America, with their cargoes, from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope, was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The resolution moved a few days ago by Mr. QUINCY, for an inquiry into the mode of administration of our revenue laws by the Treasury Department, was taken up and agreed to; and Mr. QUINCY, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. BIBB, Mr. McBRIDE, and Mr. BLACKLEDGE, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GRUNDY, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to lay before this House a statement of the timber prepared for ship building now on hand, and also the places at which the same is deposited, and the quantum and kind of additional timber which may be requisite to complete four seventy-four gun ships; and his opinion of the time in which such ships can be prepared for service.

On this resolution, and an amendment thereto proposed by Mr. REED, a discussion of some length took place, as well on the policy of increasing the Navy, as on the proposition before the House; in which Messrs. REED, BLACKLEDGE, GRUNDY, TALLMADGE, ROBERTS, CUTTS, and BASSETT, took part.

Mr. CUTTS moved that the resolution and amendment lie on the table; which motion was supported by Mr. WIDGERY, and opposed by Mr. ALSTON, on the ground that the friends of naval augmentation would have their views furthered by the inquiry proposed, rather than embarrassed.

The question on Mr. CUTTS's motion was taken and carried—ayes 51, noes 44, and the resolution ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

IMPRISONMENT OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:
I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 9th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 19, 1812.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, requesting information touching the conduct of British officers towards persons taken in American armed ships, has the honor to lay before the President the accompanying papers marked A, B, C, from which it appears, that certain persons, some of whom are said to be native, and others naturalized citizens of the United States, being parts of the crews of the United States' armed vessels the "Nautilus" and the "Wasp," and of the private armed vessel the "Sarah Ann," have been seized, under the pretext of their being British subjects, by British officers, for the avowed purpose, as is understood, of having them brought to trial for their lives, and that others, being part of the crew of the Nautilus, have been taken into the British service.

H. OF R.

DECEMBER, 1812.

The Secretary of State begs leave also to lay before the President the papers marked D and E. From these it will be seen, that whilst the British naval officers arrest as criminals such persons taken on board American armed vessels as they may consider British subjects, they claim a right to retain on board British ships of war American citizens who may have married in England, or been impressed from on board British merchant vessels; and that they consider an impressed American, when he is discharged from one of their ships as a prisoner of war. All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

Sir John Borlase Warren to Mr. Monroe.

HALIFAX, September 30, 1812.

SIR: Having received information that a most unauthorized act has been committed by Commodore Rodgers, in forcibly seizing twelve British seamen, prisoners of war, late belonging to the Guerriere, and taking them out of the English cartel brig Endeavor on her passage down the harbor of Boston, after they had been regularly embarked on board of her for an exchange, agreeable to the arrangements settled between the two countries, and that the said British seamen, so seized, are now detained on board the United States' frigate President as hostages; I feel myself called upon to request, sir, your most serious attention to a measure so fraught with mischief and inconvenience, destructive of the good faith of a flag of truce and the sacred protection of a cartel. I should be extremely sorry that the imprudent act of any officer should involve consequences so particularly severe as the present instance must naturally produce, if repeated; and although it is very much my wish, during the continuance of the differences existing between the two countries, to adopt every measure that might render the effect of war less rigorous, yet, in another point of view, the conviction of the duty I owe my country would, in the event of such grievances as I have already stated being continued, not admit of any hesitation in retaliatory decisions; but as I am strongly persuaded of the high liberality of your sentiments, and that the act complained of has originated entirely with the officer who committed it, and that, it will be as censurable in your consideration as it deserves, I rely upon your taking such steps as will prevent a recurrence of conduct so extremely reprehensible in every shape.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient and most faithful humble servant,

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Oct. 28, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 30th September, complaining that Commodore Rodgers, commanding a squadron of the United States' Navy at the port of Boston, had taken twelve British seamen, lately belonging to His Britannic Majesty's ship the Guerriere, from a cartel in the harbor of Boston, and that he had detained them on board the President, a frigate of the United States, as hostages.

I am instructed to inform you, that inquiry shall be made into the circumstances attending, and the causes which produced the act, of which you complain; and that such measures will be taken, on a knowledge of them, as may comport with the rights of both nations, and may be proper in the case to which they relate.

I beg you, sir, to be assured that it is the sincere desire of the President to see (and to promote, so far as depends on the United States) that the war which exists between the two countries be conducted with the utmost regard to humanity. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 17, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to annex a list of twelve of the crew of the late United States' sloop of war Wasp, detained by Captain John Beresford, of the British ship Poictiers, under the pretence of their being British subjects.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant.

GEORGE S. WISE, *Purser.*HON. PAUL HAMILTON, Sec'y Navy.

(C.)

Extract of a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, CHARLESTON,

November 4, 1812.

"Information having been given upon oath to Lieutenant Grandison, who at present commands in the Naval Department here, that six American seamen, who had been taken prisoners on board of our privateers, had been sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects for treason, he called upon the marshal to retain double that number of British seamen as hostages. The marshal, in consequence of instructions from the Department of State, asked my advice on the subject, and I have given my opinion that they ought to be detained until the pleasure of the President shall be known. The testimony of Captain Moon is herewith. I hope, sir, you will have the goodness to have this business put in the proper train to have the President's pleasure on this subject communicated to the marshal."

The Message and documents were, on motion, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate for increasing the Navy of the United States.

MR. ROBERTS made a motion to strike out the provision of the bill for building seventy-four gun ships; which was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows: For the motion 57, against it 65, viz:

YEAS—Daniel Avery, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, William Barnett, William W. Bibb, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, William A. Troup, Charles Turner, junior, Pierre Van Cortlandt, Laban Wheaton, Leonard White, and Thomas Wilson—65.

Mr. ROBERTS then moved a new section to the bill, providing for the equipment forthwith, in addition to the force contemplated by the bill, of six sloops of war.

This motion was also negative—ayes 44.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time tomorrow.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases, and the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendments reported by the Committee of Ways and Means were severally agreed to; when

Mr. ROBERTS moved to strike out the first section, with a view to try the sense of the Committee on the object and principles of the bill.

This motion gave rise to considerable debate, in which Mr. ROBERTS advocated his motion, and argued against the object of the bill; who was replied to by Messrs. GOLD and CHEVES.

The question was then taken on the motion, and lost—ayes 50, noes 56.

Mr. H. CLAY renewed a motion, made by him some days ago, when in Committee of the Whole on the same subject, which was negative.

The Committee of the Whole then rose, and reported the bill, with the amendments to the House; and the House proceeded to consider the same.

Mr. GHOLSON, after some introductory remarks, made a motion to strike out of the bill the words 15th day of September," and insert "1st day of August."

This motion was debated at considerable length; Mr. GHOLSON advocated, and Messrs. CHEVES and GOLD opposed it.

The question on the motion was decided by yeas and nays, and lost, as follows:

Mr. LITTLE, after some prefatory remarks, moved that the words "ordered and placed at the risk of American citizens prior to the 2d day of November, 1810," be inserted in the bill.

Mr. NELSON rose, and in a speech of some length entered into an animated discussion of the policy of the bill; in which he declared himself in favor of extending relief to the merchants, and against any discrimination.

Several motions to adjourn were made without success.

The question on Mr. LITTLE's motion was taken and lost—ayes 45.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on ordering the bill to a third reading, and carried—62 to 58, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, December 23.

Another member, to wit: from Louisiana, THOMAS BOLLING ROBERTSON, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Joseph Hodgson, praying indemnification for a loss sustained by fire of a building, at the time (1800) occupied by the War Department. [The report declares the petition reasonable, and that it ought to be granted.] Committed to a Committee of the Whole.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The bill from the Senate to increase the Navy of the United States, was read a third time; and the question being stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. MCKEE spoke at considerable length against its passage, and concluded by moving to postpone it to Monday, with a view to obtaining further information on the subject of the materials, &c.

The motion to postpone was supported by Mr. ALSTON and Mr. SEYBERT, and opposed by Mr. MILNOR, Mr. BASSETT, and Mr. WIDGERY. The votes were for postponement 51, against it 73, as follows:

So the motion was lost.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill,

Mr. POTTER said, as he represented a commercial State, and his constituents at present were very anxious for a navy, he felt it his duty to assign his reasons for the vote he was about to give. He said, when he saw his political friends, with only one exception, in favor of the bill under consideration, and the anxious solicitude of the gentleman on the other side of the House for its fate, he felt himself much embarrassed; but while he was by his feelings at times almost impelled to vote in its favor, his judgment compelled him to vote against it.

Mr. P. said, his objections to a navy were that it would cost more than ever it would be worth to the nation; that we could not build, man, and support the ships contemplated, in addition to our present establishment, without resorting to the same means for their support as other maritime nations had done; that it must be supported by impression or oppression; we must either impress our citizens to man our Navy, and compel them to serve against their wills for almost nothing, or oppress the nation with taxes not to be endured, to enable the Government to give such wages as would induce our seamen to enter voluntarily into our service. He said it had been observed by the friends of the bill, and particularly by his friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MILNOR,) that the Navy was at this time very popular with all parties, in this House and the nation; that they had done honor to themselves and to their country, while our Army had, in almost every instance, been defeated and disgraced. Mr. P. said we had been very unfortunate in the selection of some of our commanding officers, who had, as it would seem, been appointed more because they wanted office, than because they were qualified for it; some of them were too old, and others too young; but he believed we had as good officers in our Army as we had in the Navy, and whenever the time should arrive that would afford them a fair opportunity, that they would equally distinguish themselves.

Mr. P. said there was a kind of popular delusion at this time about a Navy, that he found difficult to oppose. He said it was at least popular with all those who expected to make money out of it, and with many from the most honorable motives. But he believed, when the people, who were to pay all, and receive nothing, come to see that we had spent for them the last year upwards of twenty millions of dollars, and that notwithstanding all the moneys we had received, by double duties, and otherwise, that we had increased the national debt in that year, ten millions six hundred thousand dollars, and that we want, for the expenses of the present year, agreeably to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $31,925,000, exclusive of the expense of the contemplated increase of our Navy, and for losses and war contingencies—that when they should put those sums together, and apportion them to the several States, agreeable to the Constitution, and see that but few individuals, and not many States, would have personal property sufficient to pay their proportions—that this delusion as to those who have eventually all this money to pay would at least vanish. Mr. P. said, that his friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) had no doubt but money could be borrowed, for the purposes of a navy, and in his anxiety for the fate of this bill seemed almost willing to guarantee to that extent, but would not extend his guarantee farther. Mr. P. said it was for the interest of those who had money, to loan it; they expected their interest annually, and their principal according to agreement; not so with those who will have to repay all those loans, by taxation, they expect neither interest nor principal again. He said that this business of borrowing money to answer all the purposes of the Government, to build a navy, raise and support an army, and carry on war, without regard to the sum, and without providing in the least degree the means of repayment, either principal or interest, made him think of a man who sent an agent to purchase some property for him, who on his return began to talk about the price; the man became impatient, and said he did not want to hear about the price, the only thing he wanted to know was, whether the man would trust him and take his note. It would seem that we were going upon the same principles; we do not consider whether the people would be willing to pay the sums contemplated for the objects in view; the only question that seems to present itself is, can we borrow the money?

United States that not only the recruiting service, but loans to the Government, for the purposes of carrying on the war, had been discouraged. Mr. P. said, if all those who had money were desirous to lend it, as was generally the case, we should find that the unemployed capital in the United States, had been very much overrated, as well as the strength of the country for the purpose of carrying on a war; that there were many rich men in the United States, but their property consisted in lands, houses, stores, wharves, and ships, which were now of little value, compared with their former valuations. But why, said he, complain of those who were opposed to the war, and who suffer the most by it, because they will not lend their money to carry it on? It would have seemed, before the war was declared, from addresses from States and public meetings, pledging and promising their support to the Administration, that nine-tenths of the people were in favor of the war; why don't they now come forward and make good their promises, and help them along with it, and not depend upon the pecuniary aid of those opposed to it?

It was likewise said that the spirit of the nation demanded this increase of our Navy. He remembered very well that it was so said on a former occasion, and that the finger of Heaven pointed to war, but it was very soon found that the finger of the people pointed to peace. It was then said, as it is now said, that we were a divided people, and it was necessary to convince foreign nations that we would support our own Government. The then Executive was addressed from all parts of the United States, with pledges of life, fortune, and sacred honor, in support of what he had done, or should do. This was intended to correct the error abroad as to our being a divided people, and for no other purpose. Its object was entirely misunderstood by the then President. He thought they were uneasy and wanted something to steady them. An army was raised, and taxes laid for their benefit;—a navy was provided which did honor to themselves and the nation, that protected our commerce, and caused our flag to be respected in every sea, in consequence of which our revenue continued to increase, notwithstanding all the depredations committed on our commerce, and the nation appeared to be prosperous and happy; but when the people were called upon to test the sincerity of their pledges and promises, by the payment of a tax of only two millions of dollars, they said they had been entirely misunderstood, that those pledges were intended to have an influence abroad, and not for the purpose of trouble at home, and that they would not pay taxes to support a navy or army; and the first opportunity they had, they changed the Administration. If they would not then pay two millions of dollars, to support that Administration, can they be expected to pay nearly fifty millions for the support of this, for the same purposes?

Mr. P. said, this Administration, during the last session of Congress, was addressed from all parts of the Union, and from many of the States in their legislative capacities, promising to support them with their lives, fortunes, and sacred honors, in common form. This perhaps was to have its influence abroad. The Administration, believing them sincere, have been induced to declare war, and are left to carry it on without money. They find that those pledges and promises cost but little, and are worth nothing; and the consequence will be, that when the people are called upon to pay those enormous expenses, the present Administration will share the same fate from them as the former did.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUTTS) said the expense of this Navy would swamp the present, as it had done a former Administration; that, Mr. P. said, was a business of their own, it was no concern of his; but if with their means they could not manage the affairs of the nation, with their present experience, having seen the rock on which a former Administration split, they would richly deserve it; his only object was to keep his constituents from being mired down with debt and taxes.

One reason for this Navy was, that it was to protect our commerce. Mr. P. said we had none that was worth having, except direct to our enemy, and that needed no protection; our commerce to France was not worth having, nor had many vessels gone there, and only one returned for some time past, and that may have been permitted to make a good voyage, and return to decoy others, and as soon as the Emperor had property in his possession to make it worth his while to make a decree to confiscate it, we may expect to hear of one dated at Moscow, or wherever he may happen to be, and that will be the last we may expect from it. As to our commerce to Spain and Portugal, it may be pretended that those places were neutral; he said they were as much in the possession, and under the control of the English, as Holland was under France; and what said he, was the fact—vessels were clearing out from Alexandria, and other ports of the United States, according to law, direct for Lisbon, with bread stuffs, to feed the English fleet and army, when it was very much wanted for the consumption of the people of the United States; and when he believed it cost only five per cent. to insure to Lisbon, when it was worth twenty to insure to the Eastern States; the consequence was that the English could supply Halifax with flour, by the way of Lisbon, cheaper than the Eastern States could be furnished. He said, although opposed to restrictions in time of peace, he was in favor of them in time of war, and at any rate he never would lend his aid to support a policy that would starve ourselves and feed our enemies.

Mr. P. had heard it said, that we were to operate upon the British Government through their manufactures, and he said, they in their turn were now operating upon our Government through our great wheat-raising States; for if the Government dare not prevent these people from selling their flour and corn, to go directly to feed the fleets and armies of our enemies, for fear of political consequences, if they will bear no restraint in that respect, and the people of the United States will neither bear privations, or pay taxes to support the Administration in the contest, they will have found out, when too late, that they have been deceived, and had better not have made war, and that they had better get out of it as soon as they can—as it would now seem to appear that the people have less of the hostile, and more of the Christian spirit, towards the English since the war, than before, at least as far as the injunction to feed their enemies would go.

Another reason for the increase of the Navy at this time, was to carry on the war in which we are engaged: Mr. P. said, many of the causes of irritation between the two nations had been done away long since, and the principal cause of war removed, about the time it was declared. He said, that our difficulties with the English, as well as he could remember, had been four—the carrying trade, the affair of the Chesapeake, the Orders in Council, and the impressment of our seamen. The first has been done away, as the English have taken all the colonies of their enemy. The second has been settled to the satisfaction of the Administration long since, and very lately that foul stain on the American flag and character has been wiped off by our Navy, in a manner honorable to them, and satisfactory to the nation. As it respected the Orders in Council, which he considered the principal cause of the war, he believed there were not many gentlemen who would say, if the news of repeal had reached this country before the declaration of war, but that we should now have been in peace; if then a majority could not be found to declare war for the present existing cause, why continue it, when the principal cause is removed?

It now remains for the nation to determine, whether they will impress their own citizens to go into the Navy, and draught them to go into the Army, and to oppress all to pay taxes, and to fight Great Britain until she will relinquish a right she claims to search our merchant vessels, to take out her own subjects, to help her to fight her own battles. Mr. P. said, he was willing to protect those people, as long as they would remain within our territorial jurisdiction, where we have the means to do it, but as soon as they went beyond that, and went where their old master was prowling in every direction, if they got taken he would not go to war for them, nor be at the expense of one cent, to reclaim the whole of them.

Many gentlemen support this bill upon the principle that this settles the question; that we are to become a great naval Power, and to have a permanent Naval Establishment; to this Mr. P. said, he objected for the reasons he had assigned; he said, he had found mankind much the same: give them power, and they would not only use, but abuse it—give them money and they will spend it, and want to borrow; and, he said, if an Administration like the present, without money, without an army, or navy, would plunge this country so unprepared into a war, and continue it for the present existing cause, and extend their views of conquest to the Floridas, the Canadas, Quebec, Halifax, and Nova Scotia, whenever they should have money, an army, and ships; the next thing they would want colonies, as other nations had done, and that Bermuda and New Providence would be in our way; and we must have Jamaica to get good rum and sugar. And instead of this country enjoying peace, which is above all things the most desirable, we should be involved like other nations in perpetual war.

Mr. P. said, that although many things had taken place, that, at the time, he considered against the true interest of this country, yet he now considered them as operating for our good, and that he could not believe that we were now as we had been, the peculiar favorites of Heaven; he considered it unwise in Congress when they refused to renew the charter of the United States Bank, and double its capital, and equally so, in not repealing the non-importation act, but he began to think that these two measures would turn out ultimately for the benefit of the people. The repeal of the law would not only have given our merchants an opportunity to get home their property, bought and paid for, (which they have done without a repeal,) but to have got credit to a large amount, which would have given the Administration such a revenue, together with the management of such a bank capital, that it would have enabled them to build ships, raise armies, and to have continued this war for some time, independent of the people, and they not have known the danger they might have been in until too late, in consequence of a large standing army with an ambitious military chief at their head, and who they would find more difficulty in removing than they did the members of that House, by exercising their Constitutional privileges at an election.

Mr. P. said the Chairman of the Naval Committee deserved much for his perseverance and zeal in favor of the bill under consideration; he said he wished he could reconcile it to his judgment and sense of duty to vote for it, but as it would increase very much the sums of money wanted for the purposes of the Government for this year, and as he had been opposed to the war from its commencement, and did not intend to vote either for loans or taxes to carry it on, or to help them in their pecuniary concerns, he would not vote for any thing that would embarrass or increase them.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.—Lost.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The bill from the Senate directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, penalties, and forfeitures, in certain cases, was read a third time; and the question being stated, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CHEVES stated, that a doubt had arisen in the minds of some gentlemen, and a communication had been received from the proper officer of the Government on the subject, whether, as the importations had been contrary to law, the payment of the duties thereon could be enforced after the passage of the bill. He therefore proposed, under the direction of the Committee of Ways and Means, to amend the bill by striking out therefrom the words "and the duties payable on such goods, wares, and merchandise, being paid and secured to be paid, agreeably to law," and inserting the words "on payment of the duties which would have been payable by law, had such goods, wares, and merchandise, been legally imported."

This amendment, at this stage of the bill's passage, requires unanimous consent, which was accorded by the House, after a few observations from Mr. BIBB, who stated, that, although a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means were opposed to the bill, they had unanimously concurred in the proposed amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS opposed the passage of the bill, as well on account of its general principles, as of the difficulty of legislating on it.

Mr. CHEVES replied.

MEDAL TO COMMODORE PREBLE, &c.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of the Navy, complying with their resolution of the 16th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 23, 1812.

The following is the report referred to in the above Message:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 21, 1812.

SIR: On the subject of the resolution of the honorable the House of Representatives, of the 16th instant, I have the honor to state, that, in pursuance of the resolution of Congress of the 3d March, 1805, a gold medal, emblematical of the attacks on the town, batteries, and naval force, of Tripoli, by the squadron under Commodore Preble's command, was presented to Commodore Preble, in the manner stated in the enclosed letter, dated May 17, 1806: That one month's pay was allowed, "exclusive of the common allowance, to all the petty officers, seamen, and marines, of the squadron, who so gloriously supported the honor of the American flag, under the orders of their gallant commander, in the several attacks:" That no sword has been presented to either of the commissioned officers or midshipmen, who distinguished themselves in the several attacks: And that it is not known to this Department that there ever was made by Congress a specific appropriation of $20,000 for the purpose of carrying into effect the resolution referred to.

With respect to that part of the resolution which requests the President to cause a sword to be presented to each of the commissioned officers and midshipmen who distinguished themselves, it is presumed that the President saw what to his mind appeared difficulties of great delicacy, from the peculiar language of the resolution. By the resolution, he was requested to present swords to such only as had distinguished themselves; and all having been represented to him as having acted gloriously, he could not in justice draw with precision a line of discrimination. He felt, it is presumed, a repugnance to the making of a selection, which, by implication, would necessarily have cast an unmerited reproach upon all not therein included. A degradation of that kind might have greatly injured the service, and could not possibly have been grateful to the honorable feelings of the favored officers.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect,

PAUL HAMILTON.

To the PRESIDENT.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 17, 1812.

SIR: In pursuance of the resolution of Congress of the 3d March, 1805, requesting the President of the United States to cause a gold medal to be struck, emblematical of the attacks on the town, batteries, and naval force, of Tripoli, by the squadron under your command, and to present it to you in such manner as in his opinion would be most honorable to you, the medal, which will herewith be delivered to you by Lieutenant Jones, has been struck. You will receive it, sir, as a testimony of your country's estimation of the important and honorable services rendered by you; and you will be pleased to accept an assurance of the great pleasure I have in the honor of presenting it to you.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

R. SMITH.

To Com. EDWARD PREBLE.

From the records of the Navy Department.

PAUL HAMILTON.

After some conversation as to the proper course for this business to take, it was referred to a select committee, to consist of seven members, to consider and report thereon.

presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States;" which was read and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," with an amendment; in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting his report in relation to the execution of the act for arming the militia of the United States, made in obedience to a resolution of the seventh instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

[It appears from the report that stands of arms have been issued to the following States, viz: to New Hampshire 1,000; to Vermont, 2,500; Rhode Island 1,000; New Jersey, 1,000; Delaware 500; North Carolina 2,130; South Carolina 2,000; Georgia 1,000; Ohio 1,500; Kentucky 1,500; Tennessee 1,500; Illinois Territory 216; Louisiana Territory 250; in all 16,096 stands;—and that there have been loaned, as follows: to Rhode Island 250; Delaware 650; Ohio 3,500; District of Columbia 2,200. Contracts have been made under the law for 85,200 stands, of which 53,560 had been delivered by the contractors on the 7th October, 1812.]

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the amount of merchandise or other articles purchased for and furnished the Indians, by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, in the Indiana Territory, subsequent to the first day of January, 1803, and prior to the first day of January, 1812; distinguishing the different dates of the purchases, of whom and by whom purchased, and for what tribe or tribes of Indians.

Ordered, That Mr. JENNINGS and Mr. BOND be a committee to present the said resolution to the President of the United States.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," were read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement of the annual revenue of the United States, from the commencement of the Federal Government until the present time; distinguishing the amount received from the duties on imports and tonnage; after deducting therefrom the amount which may in any year have been paid on account of debentures; from internal taxes, from direct taxes, from sale of lands, and from all other sources. Also an account, within the same period, of the annual expenditures on account of the Army, distinguishing the amount of expense of the Indian Department, the Navy, foreign intercourse; distinguishing the amount on account of Barbary Powers, and of other civil expenses on account of the civil list.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution expressive of the sense of the House of the gallantry and good conduct of Captains Hull, Jones, and Decatur, and their respective crews, in their late conflicts with the enemy.

The resolution was amended, reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. RANDOLPH, on whose suggestion the phraseology of the resolve had been amended in Committee of the Whole, moved now to recommit it to a select committee.—Motion negatived.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 28.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the Illinois Territory; which was read: When Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, presented a bill giving a right of pre-emption to certain settlers on public lands in the Illinois Territory; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The engrossed joint resolution of approbation and thanks to our naval heroes, Hull, Decatur, and Jones, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACOCK, the bill to amend the naturalization laws of the United States was recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of amendment.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the Postmaster General to establish post-roads in certain cases. [Between the seat of Government and the headquarters of the armies, &c.]

Some objections were made by Mr. TALLMADGE to the indefinite phraseology of the bill, and replied to by Mr. RHEA, but no motion for amendment was made.

The bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for navy pensions in certain cases; which was reported to the House and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, made on the second instant, respecting an extension of the time limited by law for the payment of lands purchased of the United States.

The report concludes with the following resolutions, the adoption of which the Committee recommend:

"Resolved, That such part of the laws for the sale of public lands as allow a credit on part of the purchase money, be repealed; and that the price at which lands shall be offered in future shall be one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

"Resolved, That in future sales a portion of the public lands be offered in tracts of eighty acres.

"Resolved, That two years be given in addition to the time allowed by law to the purchasers of public lands, whose time of payment shall have or may expire on or before the first day of January, 1814, on condition that all the interest that has accrued or may accrue on or before the 18th day of March next, shall be paid at that day, and the interest that may become due thereafter shall be paid at the day on which the time, according to existing laws, shall expire for making payment."

Considerable desultory debate took place on these propositions; but the Committee rose without coming to any decision thereon, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, December 29.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company, in Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, presented a bill making provision for an additional number of General officers; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States."

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act to raise an additional military force," and for other purposes, were discharged from the consideration of the said bill, and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

IMPORTATIONS FROM INDIA.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred the petitions of Simon Forrester, David D. Pulsifer, and Boardman and Pope, and others, importers of goods, wares, and merchandise, from British settlements beyond the Cape of Good Hope, praying to be permitted, on securing the duties payable on such goods, when legally imported, to sell and dispose of them, and so forth; also, a bill from the Senate, embracing the cases of the petitioners, reported the said bill, with sundry amendments; also, sundry documents explanatory of the subject; which were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The documents are as follow:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 10, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor, in compliance with the request of the Committee of Ways and Means, to submit such information as appears to have been received at this office concerning the importations from any of the ports of India, since the commencement of the operation of the non-importation act.

It will be recollected, that all the vessels which had cleared from the United States for any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope, prior to the 10th of November, 1810, were, by the non-importation act, of 2d March, 1811, exempted from its general provisions, and permitted to import their return cargoes. Of those cargoes, as they were entered without difficulty, no particular account has been received; and it is presumed that they were not intended to be embraced by the inquiry of the committee.

It is also possible that, on the subject of some of the importations, not permitted by the act above-mentioned, letters may have been received from the parties, and that their names, not being recollected, and no regular application for a remission of the forfeiture having been made, some of the cases thus communicated may now be accidentally omitted. Nor is it probable that application should have generally been made to the Treasury respecting vessels admitted to entry by virtue of the act of 5th of July last, since it was evident, by the tenor of that act, that the ultimate disposition of the cargoes depended on a future act of Congress, and not in any degree on the Secretary of the Treasury. Indeed, it is known, from report, that two vessels of that description have arrived, of which no official information has been received.

The following cases have been officially communicated, viz:

The ship "Amiable" sailed from Philadelphia for the Isle of France, on the 22d of December, 1810; arrived at that place subsequent to its capture by the British, and returned to Philadelphia in August, 1811, with a cargo, the produce of that island. On application to the Treasury for a remission, it being certified by the district judge that the capture of the Isle of France by the British, which took place early in December, 1810, was not known at Philadelphia till the 2d of April, 1811, the forfeiture was unconditionally remitted.

The ship "Lark" also sailed for Isle of France on the 3d of January, 1811; arrived there, and returned to Philadelphia a few days after, and under the same circumstances as the ship "Amiable," with the exception of her having brought a small parcel of merchandise, presumed to be manufactures of British India, and which had been originally shipped, at the Isle of France, on board of another vessel, bound to Philadelphia, as early as October, 1810, but was detained in port by reason of the attack and capture of the island by the British. On application to the Treasury for a remission, the forfeiture was unconditionally remitted, "except so far as relates to any articles of the produce or manufacture of any British possessions, other than the Isle of France, which may have been imported in the said vessel, the decision, in relation to such articles, being for the present suspended." It is not known whether that merchandise has been condemned, as there was some doubt as to the place where manufactured; but, if condemned, a remission will probably be granted on terms at least as favorable as in the case of the "South Carolina," hereafter mentioned.

The brig "South Carolina" sailed from Philadelphia for Calcutta, on the 26th of December, 1810, with about $23,000 on board, stated to have been shipped for the purpose of covering the expenses of the voyage, in case of a disappointment in the object of the said voyage, which was undertaken in order to bring from Calcutta the proceeds of funds, wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, and which were in British India prior to the President's proclamation of the 2d of November, 1810. The vessel, with a return cargo, (purchased with the said funds and outward cargo,) sailed from Calcutta in October, 1811, bound to Philadelphia. The owners expecting the vessel, and finding the non-importation act still in force, employed pilots in the bay of Delaware, for the purpose of warning the vessel not to enter into the waters of the United States; but the vessel was compelled, by stress of water, to enter the port of Charleston, (where she arrived on the 27th of January, 1812,) instead of proceeding to Philadelphia. On application to the Treasury for a remission, and the above-mentioned facts being proved to the satisfaction of the district judge, and stated by him to be correct and true, the forfeitures were remitted, on condition "that, from the proceeds of sale of the cargo, the costs and double duties, as fixed by the act of first of July, 1812, should be deducted; that the residue, if not exceeding the prime cost, freight, and charges, of said cargo, should be returned to the owners; but, in case of excess, so much only of the said residue as would be equal to the said prime cost, freight, and charges, should be returned to the owners; and that the balance, or surplus, should be divided in the same manner as the forfeiture would have been." The result of the sales is not known at the Treasury; but there is reason to believe that they have not produced any surplus, and that the effects of the decision have only been the payment of double duties, and, in every other respect, an unqualified remission of the forfeitures.

The brig "Ellen Maria" sailed on the 10th of January, 1812, from Providence for the Isle of France, then a British colony, and thence bound, as is stated, for Smyrna. On her return voyage, and being informed at sea of the declaration of war, she proceeded to Boston, where she arrived prior to the 16th of September, 1812. No bond having been required at the Isle of France to land the cargo in the United States, the vessel is not embraced by the provisions of the act of 5th July last. The owners, from whom this statement of facts is obtained, have been informed that the Secretary of the Treasury had no authority to grant relief, except in the manner prescribed by law, viz: on application for remission, presented through the district judge, on whose statement of facts, alone, the Secretary of the Treasury could take the subject into consideration. No application has, as yet, been received.

The brig "Aurora" sailed in July, 1809, from New York, being cleared for Brazil alone, but with instructions to the captain to proceed thence to the South sea, and ultimately to Canton or Manilla. The vessel not being cleared for a port beyond the Cape of Good Hope, is not embraced within the exception made in favor of such vessels by the act of 2d March, 1811. The Aurora, after a long and circuitous voyage, arrived at Calcutta in September, 1811. She was chartered there on the 26th of December following, by citizens of the United States, who had knowledge of the non-importation act, but who seem to have presumed that the vessel, having sailed from the United States prior to the 10th of November, 1810, would, by virtue of the provisions of the act of 2d March, 1811, be permitted to bring a return cargo from British India. The same citizens purchased at Calcutta, and shipped on board of the Aurora, a cargo of India goods; and, to accomplish the purchase, borrowed the necessary sum from a British house in that place. The policies of insurance were pledged to the lenders; and, by the terms of the agreement, the cargo was, in fact, on their risk, while at sea; but, from its arrival into the United States, the merchandise was at the risk, and on account, of the American shippers, who are bound for the amount borrowed. The Aurora arrived at Philadelphia on the 16th of June, 1812, and an application has been made to the Treasury for a remission. No decision has taken place; but the owners of the cargo have been verbally informed that the voyage from Calcutta, having been undertaken by them with a knowledge of the non-importation act, and without even the plea of having funds in India, which they wanted to bring to the United States, the transaction appeared, on their part, in the light of a direct and voluntary infraction of the law. As the cargo had not, however, been landed when the act of 5th July passed, and as that act, without reference to the time of arrival, or to any of the circumstances of the voyage, admits to entry all American vessels previously laden in India, for the landing of whose cargoes in the United States bond had been given, it appears that the Aurora is entitled to the benefits of that act; and it is believed that the owners of the cargo have availed themselves of its provisions, and that the cargo has been accordingly entered, and remains subject to the disposition of Congress. With respect to the vessel, a remission will, if necessary, be granted by the Treasury, the owners having had no concern in, or control over, the illegal part of her employment.

The ship "American Hero" sailed on the 17th January, 1811, from Boston. The master sold her cargo at the Cape of Good Hope and the Isle of France; and having taken in payment bills of exchange on Madras and Calcutta, proceeded there and purchased a cargo, for the landing of which, in the United States, bond was given. In conformity with orders from the owners, he thence went to Brazil, where he was not permitted to sell his cargo; and, after having waited several months, hearing of the last American embargo, and apprehending war, he left Brazil, and brought the vessel and cargo to Providence, where she arrived prior to September last.

The "Atalanta" arrived, prior to the 8th of November last, in Philadelphia, from Calcutta, via Rio Janeiro, with a valuable cargo. The circumstances of the voyage have not been communicated to the Treasury.

The two last cases being clearly embraced by the act of 5th July, 1812, the parties have been informed that the cargoes must necessarily remain subject to the disposition of Congress, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had no power to interfere.

Another case has been mentioned, which, although no importation has taken place, ought, perhaps to be stated:

The brig "Daphne" sailed from Philadelphia, for Calcutta, in the Spring of 1811. According to orders, and in order not to infringe the law, the vessel, with her return cargo, proceeded to St. Bartholomew's. Being there when the declaration of war between the United States and Great Britain took place, and the act of 5th July last not being known, the cargo was landed, and the vessel discharged. By the provisions of the said act, the cargo is not admissible to entry, unless brought in the vessel on board of which it was laden in India; and the owners, who cannot now import it legally, are placed in a worse situation than those who have infringed the law.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

DECEMBER, 1812.

Extract from a regulation for the conduct of the trade of foreign nations, with the ports and settlements of the British nation, in the East Indies, and for defining the duties to which such trade shall be subject at such of the said ports and settlements as are immediately dependent on the Presidency of Fort William. Passed by the Vice President, in Council, on the 30th April, 1811.

ARTICLE 3.—First. Foreign European ships, belonging to countries having no establishment in the East Indies, and ships belonging to the United States of America, may, (when those countries and States, respectively, are in amity with His Majesty) in like manner, [as, in article two, is granted to the ships of nations having settlements in the East Indies] freely enter the British seaports and harbors in the East Indies; they shall be hospitably received there; and have free liberty to trade in imports and exports, conformably to the regulations of the place; provided, always, that they proceed from their own ports direct to the said British territories, without touching at any port or place, whatever, on the voyage out, except from necessity, and merely to procure refreshments or repairs, in case of distress or accidents in the course of such voyage, the burden of the proof of which necessity to rest upon the parties.

Second. The vessels of the said European Powers, last aforesaid, and of the United States, shall not carry any of the articles exported by them from said British territories, to any port or place, except to some port or place in their own countries, respectively, where the same shall be unladen. The said ships shall not be cleared to carry on the coasting trade in India; but vessels going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one British port of discharge to another British port, are not to be considered as carrying on the coasting trade.

Third. The said vessels shall not be allowed to proceed either with or without return cargo from the said British territories to the settlements or factories of any foreign European nation in India, or to the territory of any Indian or Chinese potentate or power, except from the like necessity, as is before described, of which the proof shall rest with them. Nor shall the said vessels be allowed to enter the river in that part of the British territory situated in Bengal, for any other purpose than that of proceeding to the port of Calcutta for trade, refreshment, or repairs.

Fourth. In clearing out for their respective countries, the clearance shall be a direct one to the country, European or American, to which the vessel belongs, and to no other whatever; they are to give bond, with the security of a resident in the country, that they will deliver the cargo at the port for which the clearance is made, and such bond is to be cancelled when a certificate from a British Consul, or two known British merchants, resident at such port, is produced, of the bona fide delivery of the cargo there.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "supplementary to the act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States," and on the bill "in addition to the act for raising an additional military force."

The bills having been read through, a motion was made by Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS to fill the blanks in the first bill, for the amount of bounty, &c., and the question having been stated—

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said, the embarrassment which he felt on the present occasion, was not of an ordinary kind; he was so solemnly impressed with the importance of the subject before the Committee, he was fearful its success might, in some degree, depend on his efforts to sustain it; and, feeling that the interest, perhaps the character of his country might be committed by the decision, he was humbled that its cause could not by him be more ably supported. He felt, however, some confidence from the circumstance that the Military Committee was entitled to the candor of the House, because it had not presented mere fragments, to be acted on in detail, but a system on which to rest the future prosecution of the war. An explanation of its merits, from the relation in which he stood to that Committee, was probably expected of him.

Without going back to the unavoidable and just causes of the war in which we were engaged, he would presume it was the object of all to terminate it successfully, and that there now remained no other mode than to call into the field a force adequate to the command of every honorable object. The force was abundant throughout the community, to secure, if directed with skill, spirit, and enterprise, our defence everywhere; and, by offence, to make the enemy feel it had become his interest to abstain from plunder and oppression.

To effect the first great object, defence of the exposed parts, it struck him as of primary importance, that the whole jurisdictional limits of the United States should be divided into military districts, that the command of each should be intrusted to an intelligent officer, who should have under his command certain portions of artillery and infantry of the regular army; that in each district there should be a sufficient number of cannon mounted on travelling carriages, which could be rapidly directed to such parts as may be threatened; and an engineer to devise the plans and superintend the erection of such works of defence as may be necessary. These would form the rallying points of defence in periods of danger, and will be sure to meet the approbation of the whole country. When it shall have placed before it proofs that the protecting arm of Government is everywhere extended, it will bestow, in return, its confidence and attachment. For this object, also, the care of the Government cannot be too early directed to the East Florida frontier; there danger already exists. In its present state it is improvable by the enemy to our essential injury: it is perfectly within his control for every military purpose he may contemplate, and will require an equal force, whether occupied by the United States or not. He would exemplify more in detail his views on the subject of defence, by enumerating the military districts and the least number of troops which ought to be stationed in each. If the Representatives from those districts shall object, that the number of troops allotted to each was too small, and he felt confident some of them would; he replied, such objection served only to strengthen his argument, and the more satisfactorily proves the present military establishment insufficient, and that it ought to be increased. He requested it might be recollected, his observations were intended to apply to all the bills or system he had reported, because they were all, in some measure, pendent on the success of the present motion. To Boston district, including Portsmouth and the whole State of Massachusetts, 600; to Newport, including the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island, 600; to New York, inclusive of that State and New Jersey, 1,000; to Philadelphia, comprising the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware, 400; to Baltimore, Annapolis, Norfolk, including Maryland and Virginia, 500; to Charleston, including North and South Carolina, 400; to Savannah and the East Florida frontier, 2,000; to New Orleans, comprising Mobile, West Florida, and Natchitoches, 2,500; to Detroit and all the Western frontier, 2,000; making an aggregate of 10,000 regulars. These, taken from the Establishment already provided for, leaves a force of 25,000. The difference between the numbers enlisted, and effective men, is very material; in no service, however actual, is it estimated at less than one-fourth, with new levies at least one-third; deduct only 10,000 from the whole number provided for, we shall, supposing our ranks filled, have in the field only 15,000 that can be directed against Niagara, Kingston, Montreal, Lower Canada, and Halifax. Is that number sufficient for the purposes of Government? This must depend upon the number and quality of the opposing force. It ought not to be estimated that the regular force in Upper and Lower Canada is less than 12,000; besides these, there are several thousand militia, and at Halifax three thousand regulars. To drive this force from the field you should cross the St. Lawrence with a well appointed army twenty thousand strong, with a reserve, always desirable, with raw troops indispensable, of ten thousand. We ought not to calculate on peace. The Administration have in vain sued for it, through Mr. Russell, even at the expense of the sarcastic sneers of the British Minister; let us, then, prepare in good earnest for war. If the Spring shall not bring with it peace, the campaign must open in a style of vigor and force calculated to inspire confidence of success among ourselves, and awe in the enemy. The result of such a state of things will be as favorable to us, by depressing the spirits of the adversary, as by making our own troops undaunted; nothing must be left to chance that is within the compass of our means; we must deserve to be fortunate. To be successful, our movements everywhere must be in concert; at the same moment we move on Canada, a corps of ten thousand men should, from the province of Maine, threaten Halifax; as a diversion, it will indisputably be felt; such a force, if disregarded by the enemy, trusting to the supposed difficulty of approach, will be competent to the reduction of Halifax.

The character of our Government had been so depressed in Europe, not more by foreign than domestic misrepresentation, as much even within these walls as without them, it had become necessary to make war to place our backs against the wall and prove to European marauders there is a point beyond which we will not recede. This good the war has accomplished; but it has become more than ever necessary to prove that we will not only declare war, but can prosecute it with energy and courageous enterprise. The honor, the character of the nation require that the British power on our borders shall be demolished in the next campaign—her American provinces once wrested from her, every attempt to recover them will be chimerical, except through negotiation. The road to peace then lies through Canada. When we shall once be in possession of it, peace, honorable peace, the sole object of us all, is secured. But some gentlemen affect a sympathy for the Canadians—why, say they, will you make war on them? They have not injured us. Nor, sir, has the British tar injured us, although he is the instrument of plunder and impressment. It is to conquer the sovereignty of the soil, to raze the British power, to reach, by such means, her profligate and unjust ministry, that war is waged at all—the unarmed will never fall on American bayonets; it is not against the people of either Canada or Great Britain, but against the English subject in arms, that the war is directed. By physical force then alone can we proceed. Mr. W. here recapitulated at some length the amount of the force provided and that which was necessary for the various objects that should be accomplished, showing that at least twenty thousand additional regulars ought to be authorized. How, asked he, shall this deficiency be supplied? Shall we rely on the militia? Sound policy, not less than experience, forbids a draught on them for permanent service. However valuable they are for sudden emergencies, and in this way too much reliance cannot be placed on them; economy, both to them and the Government, forbid their use for other purposes. Their state of discipline and insubordination, (except in the face of danger,) circumstances growing out of the freedom of our institutions; the waste of public property, which he could illustrate by strong facts, all unite to dissuade us from this resort. Call them out on short terms of duty, and, so much time is lost in marching to and from the places of rendezvous, you are subject to pay nearly double the force necessary to maintain any one point; make the term of service long, and you disproportion the burden of the war. In short, the great mass who form the militia will find it cheaper to pay regulars than fight themselves.

Shall we any longer deceive ourselves by a further dependence on the absurd volunteer acts? Experience is equally warning on them. Though thousands of your brave countrymen, Mr. Chairman, have rushed to the field of danger, it was certainly not under the volunteer acts. If ever one scheme was better calculated to deceive its authors than another, this surely is it. To say nothing about its unconstitutional character, it is a miserable contrivance, perfectly nugatory, except to accomplish disappointment. Without a head, its operations, to say the least of them, begin at the wrong end. The people are to manage the affair—to associate—to enroll themselves—to recommend officers. Organize a regiment, it will be made up of such discordant, insubordinate materials, strangers to and ignorant of each other, confidence cannot exist in it; but, above all, the volunteer is to indent himself for three years for the performance of one year's service. Repeal these acts, as the bill proposes, with a reservation of the rights that have accrued under them, and the services to the Government of the men who have enrolled themselves, and, in their stead, authorize a corps of 20,000 men of an efficient regular character. When the colonels shall have been selected for their virtues and influence, give to them the selection of their officers—they can better judge who ought to command, and who can raise men in their own neighborhood, than the President or the Senate. This mode will only change the appointment of officers, from individual members of Congress to the colonel, who certainly will be more scrupulous who he associates with him in danger than any other can be: they may be safely intrusted with this power under the approbation of the President. With such a provision the corps can be raised almost as soon as the officers can be nominated by the President, approved by the Senate, and commissioned by the Secretary at War. The term of enlistment is, confessedly, not the most eligible to form soldiers; but, inasmuch as it is doubtful whether you can get a force sufficiently strong on a long period, the present is proposed. But for the gallant and brave patriot of the Revolution before him (Colonel STUART) he should have omitted to add this mode was found the most efficacious to raise men during the Revolutionary war: having been tested by experience it may be again relied on.

Having shown the necessity of augmenting the regular forces, it was equally material to provide for filling the ranks, and for keeping them at their full complement when filled. With this view was the 1st section introduced. The greatest evil, incident to the recruiting service, results from the number of persons to whom the public money was necessarily distributed; in proportion to the number of persons with whom it is intrusted, will be its misapplication. To remedy this it is proposed to appoint officers to each regiment, for that particular purpose, in no way different from those already appointed, who shall be employed in recruiting for their respective regiments; these to be under the order of a major, who shall receive and be accountable for the issue of money and clothes for that service. The ranks filled, the presence of all the officers on the present establishment will be indispensable, as in our service the proportion of privates to the officers is greater than in any other service whatever. The new organization which was given to the Army at the last session increased the number of privates in each company without a corresponding increase of officers. If two lieutenants were necessary in a company, for the purpose of discipline and recruiting, when it consisted of only sixty-four privates, assuredly three are as much so now it is raised to ninety. The recruits, as fast as they are enlisted, may be concentrated under the eye of the major, where they may be exercised and drilled, so that when he joins the regiment, they will be qualified to enter the ranks and face the enemy.

He expected to hear it objected that these additional officers were unnecessary, seeing the regiments were not full. He apprehended this objection was more specious than solid. Considering all the circumstances in relation to the Army, the period when raised and how officered, he believed, supposing the regiments only half filled, it was indispensably necessary the officers should be constantly with them. He was much mistaken if the officers were not as raw as the private soldiers—it was as important they should be familiar with those duties as they whom they are to command. It would be nothing short of butchery to send brave men into the field, under such circumstances, when in our power to avoid it. All the dollars and cents you will save by refusing these few additional officers would not be worth the life of a single man, to say nothing of the possible slaughter of thousands without them. Of necessity our officers need instruction; they should be devoted to it during the winter; they can be nowhere so beneficially employed as with their regiments on duty. It is the quality, not the number of the troops, that secures and improves victory.

One other objection he could anticipate—perhaps those who can sneer at the disasters and misfortunes of the late campaign may object that there is no encouragement to vote additional forces, seeing those which have been already raised have been so illy employed. It becomes us all to be equally faithful to our country, whether her arms are victorious or not; it is in times of discomfiture that the patriot's resolution and virtues are most needed. It is no matter by what party names we are distinguished, this is our country—we are children of the same family, and ought to be brothers in a common cause. The misfortune which befalls one portion, should sink deep in the hearts of the others also. What misfortune so great as the loss of character? If we shall forget our impatience under disgrace, and look back on the events that have passed, with only as much candor as becomes us, this objection must vanish. Under the circumstances in which it found itself, without experience, either in itself or others to guide it, Administration ought not to be censured for the bad military appointments it may have made, however much it may deserve, if it shall retain men in employ, when found incapable to discharge the duties intrusted to him. He was fearless of contradiction in declaring, all our disasters sprung from a cause which no man in the nation could have anticipated. It was next to impossible any human being could have foreseen, much less provided against it. It was with pain and reluctance he felt it his duty to speak of an officer fallen and disgraced; he wished he could discover any cause for the surrender of Detroit, less heinous than treachery or cowardice—between them he saw nothing to choose. Justice will hereafter, if party heat denies it now, pronounce the plan of the campaign, as intrusted to General Hull, easy to be accomplished and judicious in its objects. The commandant was furnished with every means necessary for success—with money, men, provisions, and munitions of war, in abundance. What better mode could have been adopted, to prevent Indian hostility and intercept British supplies of the instruments of massacre? That your Army had not been protruded beyond the point with which communications could have been maintained, is evident from the events which followed. What was there to mar success? The commandant at Malden needed only an apology to surrender! What if the other Hull had commanded? Everything would have fallen before him—great science was not necessary; courage and faithfulness would have accomplished everything. A train of heavy artillery was not required to batter a breach for the assault; it was not necessary to fire a single gun—not a cartridge need have been expended—the bayonet alone was adequate to have taken Malden at any hour from the moment the American Army crossed into Canada, till its most shameful retreat. The fort was not enclosed—one entire side was open to assault. Yes, sir, had the brave Hull, who bore your “thunder on the mountain wave,” directed the valor of the Army, he would have poured the storm of victory resistless on the foe. This black deed, without a battle, was consummated in the solicitous surrender of the brave corps which were hastening to his relief; these, too, were arrested and thrown back on the community, leaving the whole Western frontier exposed to savage inroad. Hence all our misfortunes! After this, will it be contended that the accidental appointment of an improper agent shall cause a refusal of the force necessary to drag our drowned honor up from the ocean of infamy into which it has been plunged? Impossible! Economy of life and treasure call for a vigorous campaign—away with lifeless expedients; miserable inertness must be banished—zeal and energy must be infused everywhere. One protracted campaign will cost twenty-fold more than the expenditure now asked for. Let this be the signal for resolution—the first evidence of energetic policy. Let us suppose ourselves leading the forlorn hope, and assume the spirit and vigor characteristic of such an enterprise—the Army will feel it—the people will feel it—disaster and disgrace will then disappear. It is to save the public treasure—the people’s blood; it is for the reclamation of character, I ask for high bounties and premiums; and, so asking, I hope not to be denied.

The question was then taken on filling the several blanks in the first bill, and carried.

Mr. H. CLAY congratulated the committee and the nation on the system which had been presented to their consideration, and the prospect of prosecuting the next campaign with a vigor which should insure a successful result. He rose at this time, however, to propose an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to repeal so much of former laws as authorizes a bounty of land to the recruits. He was satisfied that, as respected the nation, this was a waste of its capital, without producing a single provident result. As to the recruiting service, he was convinced, from what he had heard, that it added scarcely any inducement to the recruit—that it had not added an hundred men to the Army. He confessed he had been much mistaken as to the effect it had been expected to produce, &c. Mr. C. added many remarks going to support his positions, stating, among other things, that the land would in the end get into the hands of speculators, and the individuals for whose benefit it was intended would derive no advantage from it. Now, that it was proposed to increase the bounty in money, he thought it would be a proper occasion to repeal so much of the existing laws as allowed a bounty in land, on which the recruits set generally as much value as if it were located in the moon. Mr. C. concluded by making a motion to that effect.

Mr. TROUP and Mr. BRUB stated objections to the motion, as going to withdraw what was certainly, in many parts of the country, an inducement to enlistments, at a time when every means ought to be called into action for the purpose of filling the ranks of the Army.

Mr. CLAY’s motion was then agreed to by the Committee.

The other bill before the Committee, going to authorize the raising an additional force of twenty thousand men for one year, was then taken up, and the blanks therein severally filled.

Mr. PIRKIN, adverting to the provision of the bill which gives the appointment of officers below the rank of colonel to the President alone, inquired the reasons why, contrary to the general usage, the Senate were precluded from concurrence in these appointments?

Mr. WILLIAMS stated that the motive of the committee in proposing this provision was, to avoid the delay incidental to the minor appointments, which could be much more easily and effectually made by the colonels of the regiments, respectively, who would be personally acquainted with, and responsible for, the good conduct of those who were appointed.

Mr. PIRKIN said it was on account of his objections to this provision of the bill and for other reasons that he was about to move that the Committee rise. The House had just been presented with the plan of the next campaign by the Chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) and the bills for increasing our present regular force to fifty-five thousand men had been to-day for the first time under discussion. He confessed for himself that he wished for a longer time to examine them, not only in principle but in detail;

he hoped that two days at least would be spent in Committee of the Whole on a subject so all-important to the vital interests of the nation. Mr. P. particularly objected to the provision giving the appointment of inferior officers to the President exclusively. The gentleman had told the House these officers were in fact to be appointed by the colonels; and that if they were virtuous the power would be well lodged. Sir, said Mr. P., has not the gentleman this day told you that one of your Generals was either a traitor or a coward? Suppose the colonel of a regiment was such a man, could you trust the appointment of your officers to him? You would not. For this reason I would prefer the appointment residing in the officers heretofore designated for the purpose. There may not be so much despatch as in the mode now proposed, because it is not in the nature of our Government to be rapid in its movements. Despatch is the virtue of despotism, but caution and deliberation are the virtues of Republican Government. There is much more danger in giving the President the power of appointing military officers, than there would be in giving him the power of appointing civil officers. You may next say, sir, that the President shall appoint all military officers. Give him an army of an hundred thousand men, with officers of his appointment, and who will say that he shall submit to re-election every four years? The President of the United States has now more power than is consistent with the simplicity of Republican Government. If this Government ever be wrecked, it will be on the rock of Presidential power. I am not for arming him, who already possesses too much, with more powers. It is the patronage from immense standing armies that I fear. I ask the gentleman, whether raising such armies, and giving power to the President of the United States to appoint the officers, be not sapping the foundation of the Government? It is in time of wars and convulsions that power is improperly vested in men; and when they have thus obtained the power, it has been found difficult in peace to divest them of it. I ask if a Burr, or a person of like disposition, had been put at the head of this immense military force, with the power of appointing all his officers, where would be the liberties of this people? I would stop the project in limine—I would resist it at the threshold. I do hope the Committee, for this and other reasons, will rise, and spend at least another day in Committee of the Whole on this subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he was surprised to hear the gentleman talk of resisting the principle at the threshold. This principle, Mr. W. said, was not new. The law which he held in his hand, passed in the year 1798, gave the President, besides the power to commission officers, so much objected to by the gentleman, the power to call into service and commission any number of companies he thought proper. Mr. W. perfectly appreciated (he said) the observations of the gentleman about limiting Executive power; but he thought the gentleman would admit that in a state of declared war, when we are in danger from every quarter, it is not expedient to delay, procrastinate, and interrupt the necessary provisions to secure our safety. We were not in 1798, when this provision was adopted, in a state of danger; we assuredly are now, and it cannot be less expedient now than then. Sir, said Mr. W., Eratosthratus got himself a name by having destroyed the Athenian temple; let it be our care that by our delay and procrastination we do not become equally notorious in the destruction of our country.

Mr. PITKIN said it had become very fashionable of late to refer to the Administration of John Adams for precedents for measures of the present day. The measures to which the gentleman has alluded, together with many other things of that day, did not meet the approbation of Mr. P., nor, he apprehended, of the gentleman from South Carolina, whom, if he was not mistaken, he had heard inveigh against them. He considered the case the gentleman had quoted as a bad precedent, and would not pursue it. If it was wrong then, let us avoid it and do right now. Mr. P. moved that the Committee should rise and obtain leave to sit again.

Mr. LITTLE opposed the motion. The subject was as well understood now, as it could be in two or three weeks; and the gentleman was at liberty to propose any amendment now that he thought proper.

Mr. RHEA conceived that the wise framers of our Constitution had intended to authorize Congress to place the power of appointing these officers wherever they thought proper; and had not contemplated, in a case of great emergency, that any such appointments should await the slow process of going through the Senate. Mr. R. could not conceive a greater emergency than existed at present. He was, therefore, willing to sanction the exercise of the power, and was opposed to postponement.

Mr. BIGELOW hoped the Committee would rise and report progress. It was true that this bill had been proposed some days ago, but it was only to-day that the intention with which the additional force was proposed and the plan of the campaign had been laid before them, and it was impossible to examine that subject correctly without mature deliberation. He expected to have heard the gentleman go farther, and estimate the probable expense of the force proposed to be raised, and of the additional officers proposed to the present army. There is also another important consideration, said Mr. B. I was glad to hear the gentleman say his object was to effect a peace with Great Britain. If that be his object, it is proper to inquire whether this be the most probable mode of obtaining peace. I believe Great Britain would be more likely to make peace, if she were satisfied that our measures were adopted with prudence, caution, and due deliberation. She will be much more satisfied of your ability to maintain your rights if you do not attempt more than you can effect. Is it to be expected that Great Britain, powerful as she is, is to be intimidated to make peace by such measures as these? Will they tend to give her any greater idea of our power than she now has? I apprehend not, sir. I apprehend that if Great Britain sees we are adopting wise and prudent measures; that, instead of invading her territories our care is to provide for events, guard our frontier from attack, and attack her only where we can injure her, she will be much more likely than now to suppose our war will be effectually prosecuted. These are important considerations, which ought to be duly weighed before we go out of Committee of the Whole on this subject. For these reasons, sir, I am in favor of the Committee's rising, with a view to sit again on the subject.

The question was taken on the Committee's rising, and negatived—51 to 43.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to strike out the section of the bill which directs the manner in which the company officers shall be appointed. He said he had hoped that the Committee would have risen and given at least one day for consideration; that they would have maturely weighed and deliberately made up their minds on this question. It is true that, in 1798, there was a power given to the President of the United States to appoint all officers for ten thousand men under the rank of field officers; but the appointment of all field officers was retained to the President and Senate. Mr. T. said he knew how perfectly easy it was to go on step by step, and yield power till it all passed out of our hands. The argument now is a plea of urgency. What was the case in 1798? Not the same as now. Congress had been making preparations on the contingency of war. The language of the law which has been referred to is to this effect: in case of war being declared by any foreign Power, or the country actually invaded, then the President shall have the power of appointing these officers. Such a provision was very different from that now proposed. Mr. T. was also opposed to this section in the bill, because he would not pass a bill going, as far as in the power of this House, to take away the power of appointment from the Senate. It was a disrespect he would not offer to them, to call upon them to ratify a law depriving themselves of a power they have uniformly possessed and exercised.

The question was taken on Mr. TALLMADGE's motion to strike out the section, and lost.

The Committee rose and reported the two bills and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 30.

Mr. CHITTENDEN presented a bill for the relief of Royal Converse; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint, containing the result of the assays of foreign gold and silver coins made current by the act of the 16th of April, 1806; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the two bills yesterday considered. The first bill which came under consideration was the following:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one additional major to the first regiment of light dragoons, the regiment of light artillery, each regiment of infantry, and the rifle regiment, in the Army of the United States, who shall receive the like pay, rations, forage, and other emoluments, as officers of the same grade and corps of the present Military Establishment.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed, in manner aforesaid, one third lieutenant to each troop or company in the Army of the United States, who, if of cavalry or light dragoons, shall receive the monthly pay of thirty dollars; and if of other corps twenty-three dollars, and be allowed the same forage, rations, and other emoluments, as second lieutenants of the same corps to which they belong.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there be allowed to each troop or company in the Army of the United States, one additional sergeant, who shall receive the like pay, clothing, rations, and other emoluments, as sergeants of the present Military Establishment.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in order to complete the present Military Establishment to the full number authorized by law, with the greatest possible despatch, there shall be paid (in lieu of the bounty in money heretofore allowed) to each effective able-bodied man who shall be duly enlisted into the service of the United States, to serve for the term of five years, or during the war, a bounty of — dollars; but the payment of twenty dollars of the said bounty shall be deferred until he shall be mustered, and have joined some military corps of the United States for service; and a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land, as heretofore established by law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers, who shall be employed in the recruiting service, shall be entitled to receive, for every effective able-bodied man, who shall be duly enlisted by them for the term of five years, or during the war, and mustered, and between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, the sum of five dollars: Provided, nevertheless, That this regulation, so far as respects the age of recruits, shall not extend to musicians, or to those soldiers who may re-enlist into the service: And provided, also, That no person under the age of twenty-one years shall be enlisted by any officer, or held in the service of the United States, without the consent, in writing, of his parent, guardian, or master, first had and obtained, if any he have; and if any officer shall enlist any person contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, for every such offence he shall forfeit and pay the amount of the bounty and clothing which the person so recruited may have received from the public, to be deducted out of the pay and emolument of such officer.

The first amendment reported by the Committee went to repeal so much of former acts as allows a bounty in land in addition to the bounty in money.

The concurrence in the amendment was opposed by Messrs. GRUNDY, TALIAFERRO, FINDLEY, RHEA, BIBB, TROUP, and DESHA; and supported by Messrs. STOW and BAKER.

The arguments on the one hand were, generally, that the experiment of a bounty of land, even if of doubtful expediency, had not been sufficiently tested by practice to authorize its abandonment; that although, as had been stated, it might not have operated in some parts of the country to encourage enlistments; in others, it had been a main inducement; and those opposed to the amendment deemed it proper to offer every practicable facility to enlistments. On the other hand, it was said that this bounty in land was no inducement to enlistments, in any degree compared with its intrinsic value; that it was, therefore, an improvident expenditure of the public resources, especially when the bounty should have been increased, as it probably would be, to forty dollars.

The amendment was, in the end, negatived by a large majority.

Mr. PEARSON, in the course of the discussion, asked for information on the subject of the number of men now enlisted, &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, in reply, that the Committee on Military Affairs had been furnished with information on this head by the proper Department; but had deemed it would be prejudicial to the public service to lay it in detail before the public. It was, however, free to the inspection of every gentleman in the House who chose to consult the documents.

Mr. PEARSON said it was because the information was not public, and he wished to consult the documents, that he was not now prepared to vote on this subject. He could not see the necessity for appointing additional officers to the Army, when it was evident many of those already in service had not men to command. He therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to Monday. The motion was negatived.

The next question was on filling the blank for the increased bounty with forty dollars. This question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 40, as follows:

The other blanks were filled by the words, as inserted in this above copy of the bill, in italic.

Mr. ELY then moved to strike out the three first sections of the bill, for the reason that he could not see the necessity of appointing additional officers, when it was evident that more were now in service than could be employed.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. DESHA replied that, as was stated yesterday, these officers had become necessary for the recruiting service, as the services of the present officers would be necessary with their respective regiments. As to the lieutenants, when the companies consisted of no more than sixty-four men, two lieutenants had been considered necessary; and now that the companies were increased to ninety, no objection could be made to a third, which had become necessary.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH having called for a division of the question, the question was first taken on striking out the first section; and decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 75, as follows:

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the other bill reported by the committee, entitled "A bill in addition to the act to raise an additional military force, and for other purposes"—the first section of which is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, in addition to the present Military Establishment of the United States, there be raised twenty regiments of infantry, to be enlisted for the term of one year, unless sooner discharged.

[The remainder of the bill is mere detail; the bounty on enlistment sixteen dollars.]

Mr. GOLD said this was a bill involving questions of great importance, as well in principle as in its details. There was one feature especially of the bill which required mature consideration; he alluded to the limited period of service of the proposed additional force. There was no pressing emergency to hurry the bill; and he, therefore, moved to postpone the further consideration of it to Monday.

Mr. QUINCY enforced the propriety of postponement. In relation to the bill just ordered to a third reading, though he did not approve of many of its principles, he had not objected to it, not being disposed to be unnecessarily captious. But the bill now under consideration was of a very different character from that. It proposed to augment our military force by the addition of 20,000 men. It would not be pretended, he said, that the postponement of this bill for a week would materially affect the operations of the Government. It could not be pretended that the bill was not connected with the great relations of the country. On the contrary, Mr. Q. said, it opened the whole scope of the argument on the great questions growing out of the present war, and the manner in which it had been, and was proposed to be, conducted. He said that to prove it he need only refer to the observations made by the gentleman from South Carolina, who stated what proportion of force was destined by the Government against one or another quarter—against Halifax, and against the Floridas. [Mr. WILLIAMS explained, that he had spoken not of the Floridas, but the Florida frontier.] Be that as it might, Mr. Q. said, it was evident that this bill, and the questions resulting from it, were necessarily the great questions of the session; that these questions touched the whole course of the Administration; that they had relation to the present character and future prospects of the country. The bill had been brought on the tapis but last Monday, and, not having had an opportunity to examine it, he was for one unprepared to act on the subject. But it was not from personal considerations that he asked for time, but from the general duty which he owed to his constituents, which impelled him to require further time to examine the whole bearing of the question.

Mr. FISK said that he was among the number of those who ardently hoped the motion would not prevail. If on this bill all the relations of this country were to be brought into discussion, the stronger was the reason for immediately entering upon it; for, calculating on past experience, the discussion would transcend reasonable limits, and procrastinate unnecessarily the passage of the bill. The House could not have forgotten that it had been intimated from the other side of the House at the last session, that the majority were not serious in their declared intention to go to war, because the force they proposed to raise was not adequate to the object. The proposition now before the House was intended to procure an immediate addition to our military force. If the recent scenes on the frontier of New York had not been sufficient to prompt gentlemen to lend their aid to retrieve the character of the nation, no argument from this side of the House could be expected to have influence. If this bill even were to pass without undergoing the wide discussion the gentleman from Massachusetts anticipated, the gentleman need not be at a loss to find an opportunity to discuss the subject on another occasion.

Mr. GOLD said he was surprised the gentleman had not abstained from the allusion he had made to the frontier of New York. That frontier, Mr. G. said, was now a victim to the unfortunate policy which had dictated a premature declaration of war. Instead of advancing to the object for which war has been avowedly declared, we were every moment receding from it. Twelve months had been thought sufficient time for its accomplishment at the last session; and it would now take three times as long as any one could then have supposed it would. Mr. G. wished further time for consideration. After the disaster on disaster which had taken place, it was time to look about us, and see that the measures now proposed were calculated to redeem our affairs on the frontiers from the calamitous situation in which they now stand. The bill just passed upon would answer every present emergency, and give more time for mature consideration of that now before the House.

Mr. TROUP said he would have no objection to grant the postponement asked by the gentlemen, (Messrs. GOLD and QUINCY,) if their object was consistent with that of the committee. The object of the committee was to combine a union of council and energy of action in favor of the war. The next campaign must be opened with vigor, and prosecuted to success. With this view, the committee had presented a system; gentlemen might, if they pleased, call it a system of the Executive. They submitted it to the House, not as the very best which it was possible for human ability to devise, but the best which, under all circumstances, they were able to present; they asked gentlemen on the opposite side to take it, not word for word, as it was submitted, but to take it for as much as it was worth; to amend it if defective; to substitute one in lieu of it if radically wrong. Their argument would be listened to with pleasure—their amendment or substitute respectfully considered. But the motion to postpone was inadmissible, because the motive was incorrect; procrastination in the present state of the country was death. Gentlemen would neither amend the system with a view to make it better, nor would they substitute one in lieu of it. They were opposed to the war; they disavowed any responsibility for its origin, progress, or consequences—it was a war of wickedness against innocence. Gentlemen had expressly said so; they would not give you a dollar or a man to carry it on. Yet are we asked to postpone the bill—to hear the argument—to risk the loss of another campaign. If there be anything which can endanger the system, it is delay. A week or a day is of great importance. It is a Parliamentary rule, that he who is radically opposed to a bill shall not amend it. It is a good rule that he who is opposed to the war shall not plan the campaign. A gentleman on the opposite side of the House (Mr. POTTER) had said, in a spirit of frankness and candor which did him honor, that having opposed the war he was opposed to the ways and means of conducting it, and therefore to every object of expenditure connected with it—to a navy, an army, and everything else. He was happy to find, however, that there were some gentlemen on the same side of the House who would not act with him; who would not sacrifice the country to the passions of party. Mr. T. only asked that the majority, to whom the responsibility attached, should be permitted to proceed in furnishing the Executive with the means of conducting the war.

Mr. QUINCY said the gentleman from Vermont had been well answered by the gentleman from New York. It was extraordinary indeed that he should have brought into view the objection made last session on this side of the House, that the war was premature. Was not that objection made good? Had not experience proved the objection valid? Did not the present bill present further evidence of it? If gentlemen had attended to those arguments at a former session, we should not have gone to war until we were prepared, and there would have been no necessity for this bill. The honorable gentleman from Georgia, said Mr. Q., chose to intimate that our motives are not correct in wishing postponement. If the gentleman meant to intimate that we were opposed to war, and that this opinion of ours was incorrect, we certainly are opposed to war. But the question now under consideration has no bearing on that point. It concerns our relations with our constituents; which demand that we should have an opportunity to canvass the merits of the bill. As to the proposed bill, would it not be a fair argument in opposition to it that the description of force it embraces is incompetent to its object? Is it not competent to show that the whole statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina is erroneous, and that these men will not be adequate to the purposes in view? We are now about establishing or sanctioning the whole principle of the next campaign, and gentlemen are for deciding it instantaneously. Is this correct? I appeal to gentlemen themselves—their sense of propriety, of character, of duty. I shall hold myself perfectly discharged from all obligation to debate such a bill, if its decision be pressed at this moment. There can be but one apology for this haste; that this whole bill is a sham fire, to raise a great smoke, to hide a retreat. If that be the object, your haste and hurry is wise. If this bill be pressed through as proposed, without allowing time for deliberation, it will be viewed in that light by the nation. If gentlemen wish to carry on war to effect, they must carry with them the minds of intelligent people, who must first be convinced that your means are adequate to the end, the instrument to the purpose. How can it be so considered, when those who have a right to debate the subject are precluded the opportunity? No such course of proceeding is known in the British Parliament. Questions of great moment are always postponed for investigation; the day for discussion is previously fixed, and those who choose to discuss the great principles of the pending question have a right to do so. But here the wish to postpone is represented as the result of a factious spirit. Mr. Q. said, he considered the motion he had made as what he had a right to demand; that this was a subject which of all others peculiarly required discussion, viz: whether 20,000 men should be added to our regular army, when no man pretended to say that our present ranks were half filled. He did not intend to have touched the merits of the bill now; but he did, he said, wish for an opportunity to test the merits of the bill not only before the House but before the community.

Mr. RHEA said, if he thought that an allowance of a few days to the gentleman was likely to produce conviction on the gentleman's mind, he should be very ready to give it. But he saw no probability of such an event. The necessity of this bill, he said, had grown out of the defects of a system on which gentlemen had wished to rely for everything, but which great pains had been taken to render inoperative. As to the British Parliament, Mr. R. said that he had always understood, they went through every subject at one sitting; and he had no objection, for his part, as it met the gentleman's approbation, to follow their example. If the bill, indeed, was nothing but a sham fire, the sooner it was got out of the way the better. He was willing to take his share of responsibility for its passage, and if it was so terrible a thing, the sooner the nation saw and remedied the evil, the better. He was willing to run the risk. As to sham fire, he did not know what it was; it was something like the land in the moon, which had been spoken of in debate; invisible and not understood, because inaccessible to man's comprehension.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he did not feel himself authorized to require, but he should be glad that the gentleman would favor the House with an explanation of what he meant by comparing this bill to a sham fire, &c.

Mr. Q. said he would explain with pleasure. He had not said such was the character of the bill, but that it would be so considered if hurried through in this way. Did gentleman suppose the passage of such a bill as this was to affect the opinions of people across the Atlantic? No; such persons would look at our ways and means. The nerve of war is money. When you exhibit it, said he, you may produce some effect on the mind of your antagonists. But no man has yet shown how the ways and means are to be provided. Your bill will be considered a mere sham in those countries habituated to the expenses of wars, if you do not first exhibit the ways and means to carry it into operation. I object to the bill, at this time, because if the honor of the country is to be maintained, it must be on solid principles, growing out of an ample provision of revenue. After that object be effected, it will be time to go into other considerations.

Mr. Q. concluded by saying that he hoped this explanation would be satisfactory to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAMS.—Not exactly, sir. I believe there is something in the gentleman's bosom, which he has not explained. I believe, sir, that the gentleman thinks that the administration of the Government are as perfectly satisfied as we are, that the system on which the war has heretofore been conducted, is not to be relied on; that they are determined that the inertness which has heretofore pervaded everything shall cease, and that a system of energy and perseverance shall be substituted. I believe, sir, that the gentleman has discovered that we are disposed to offer such terms to Great Britain, as, should she resist them, would compel the gentleman and his friends to come out and support the war; that there is a disposition, by yielding certain minor points in controversy, to place our relations with Great Britain on such a footing as to abolish all opposition to the war, if she refuse to accommodate with us. I did hope, sir, to have drawn this knowledge and belief from the gentleman; I did hope he would have been more candid, and explained what he meant by calling this bill a sham fire, but I was mistaken.

Mr. MACON said, if the gentleman who had made the motion to postpone, wished for time to prepare amendments to the bill, he was willing to accord it. But when postponement is asked, the mover ought to show cause for it. On questions affecting the means of carrying on a war, a speedy decision seems proper, unless good grounds appear for delay. As to the British Parliament, every question was there discussed and decided in one evening; for there they always went into debate after dinner, and then their speeches were inspired by their wine. In this country the practice was different, but much greater opportunity for debate was afforded.

Mr. GOLD said he did wish to move amendments. He had an objection to the shortness of the term of service proposed, viz: one year; and he wished the bill postponed to prepare amendments.

Mr. MACON said that the gentleman and himself exactly agreed in the objection to the bill; but it required no great consideration to move to strike out "one" and insert "five" years. So that that reason was not adequate for postponement.

The question was then taken on postponement, and negative—yeas 40, nays 71, as follows:

DEATH OF MR. SMILIE.

So soon as this decision was declared—

Mr. FINDLEY rose.—It is my melancholy duty, said he, to announce to this House that my venerable colleague and old friend and associate,

JOHN SMILIE, is no more. He departed this life at two o'clock this afternoon.

A committee was then appointed to superintend the funeral of the deceased, consisting of Messrs. FINDLEY, LYLE, BROWN, ROBERTS, DAVIS, LACOCK, and HYNEMAN.

A resolution was unanimously adopted, requesting each member of the House, in testimony of their respect to the memory of JOHN SMILIE, to wear crape on the left arm for one month.

And, on motion of Mr. FITCH, the House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 31.

On motion of Mr. FINDLEY,

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of the late JOHN SMILIE, this day, at two o'clock.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify them of the death of JOHN SMILIE, late a member of this House, and that his funeral will take place at two o'clock, this day.

And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 1, 1813.

Mr. BAKER presented a petition of Michael McKewan, of Virginia, praying compensation for the loss of a negro man, in the service of the United States, in the Revolutionary Army, and for two wagons and eight horses, and sundry other articles furnished to the United States during the Revolutionary war.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. McKEE presented to the House certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Kentucky, approbatory of the conduct of the General Government, and expressive of their opinion "respecting our foreign relations."—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "approving the report of the Commissioners appointed by the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle the exterior line of the public land at West Point, in the State of New York," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

SATURDAY, January 2.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment of the Senate to the bill "in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," reported the disagreement of that committee to the said amendment.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the further consideration of the amendment was postponed until Monday next.

An engrossed bill authorizing the President of the United States to establish post routes, in certain cases, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill providing Navy pensions, in certain cases, was read the third time, and passed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The bill supplementary to the act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States, was read a third time.

Mr. Stow asked the indulgence of the House for one moment; not that he might advocate or oppose the present bill, but that he might explain to this House, and the nation, the vote he was about to give. I was, said he, decidedly opposed to the war; and I have, by every lawful means in my power, endeavored to change the Executive. Shall I then vote the means for carrying on a war which I opposed, and place those means at the disposal of men in whom I have but little confidence? I deliberately say, yes. When the people, by their constituted agents, have said "we will have war," and when they have decided who shall be the Executive to conduct it, I conceive it my duty to furnish all reasonable means for carrying their will promptly and vigorously into effect. If the Executive misuse these means, he is answerable to seven millions of people; if he use them wisely, we shall all share in the prosperity and glory of our country.

The bill was then passed—yeas 65, nays 34, as follows:

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the 12th Con. 2d Sess.—16 bill in addition to the act for raising an additional military force.

The amendments made by the House having been agreed to, the question was stated, Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?

Mr. MOSELEY said that, in stating concisely some of the reasons which would induce him to vote against the present bill, he should not attempt to enter into a consideration of the justice or expediency of the war, nor the policy of continuing it. War is declared, and it appears to be the determination of those who have the control of our public concerns to prosecute it with the utmost vigor; yes, sir, with a vigor that, within twelve months from the enlistment of the twenty thousand men to be raised by this bill, we are told must bring it to a successful termination. Really, Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the confident assurance of the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee, that with these twenty thousand men, in addition to the troops already raised, and voted to be raised, we should in a single campaign be able to conquer Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and that the object of all these conquests was to procure an honorable peace, I almost felt myself persuaded as a peace man to join the honorable gentleman in his project of fighting for peace one year, with such a certainty of obtaining it at the expiration of that period; but unfortunately I could not but recollect the fate of similar assurances made on former occasions. When we were about declaring war, I very well remember that we were told with equal confidence by gentlemen anxious to engage in it (and who would listen to no arguments, even for delay, against the measure) that we had only to declare war, and Canada would, in the course of a few months, at most, be ours; that the militia alone, with the aid of a very few regulars, would be competent to the conquest of the whole country, except the fortress of Quebec; and that that must very soon fall of course. An honorable gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Fisk) informed us that the people of those Provinces would almost conquer themselves; that they were at least pre-disposed to be conquered—to use his own expression, that they were "panting" to participate in our liberty.

Experience has now proved the fallacy of these predictions. Gentlemen must now be convinced that Canada is not to be conquered quite so easily as they had imagined—that it is not to be subdued with a few thousand militia, regulars, or volunteers, though aided by proclamations. I mention proclamations, because they seem to be considered as an indispensable auxiliary on all great emergencies. What can be done by proclamation, I will readily concede we are competent to do. No nation, I believe, ever arrived at greater perfection in the art of proclamation-making than we have done; and if history is faithful to record them, we shall in this particular at least bear the palm from all the world.

Sir, it can afford pleasure to no man, who feels as he ought for the honor and interest of his country, to dwell unnecessarily upon the disasters and disgrace which have everywhere attended our military operations from the commencement of the war to the present time. I mean upon land; for to our little Navy too much praise cannot be given. Our gallant seamen have not only afforded to their countrymen examples of valor worthy of imitation, but they have also taught us a lesson of wisdom, by which I am happy to find we have manifested a disposition to profit. But, sir, while gentlemen must feel mortified at the miserable termination of all our boasted military exploits thus far, and might wish to draw a veil over the disgraceful scenes which have taken place, it cannot be done; it would be unwise to attempt it. We ought rather to look at the causes which have produced our misfortunes, and pursue a course in future which may not expose us to similar evils.

The disasters of the war have, not only by the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee, but by other gentlemen who have occasionally adverted to the subject, been ascribed principally to three causes: the misconduct of the Commander of our Northern Army in the outset; the disaffection of the people generally in the Eastern States to the war; and to the refusal of the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut to furnish their required detachments of militia. I apprehend, however, that to neither of these causes, nor to all of them combined, can fairly be imputed the series of disasters and defeats which we have experienced.

The capture of Hull and his Army might have retarded our operations in that quarter. But has there not been time enough to have retrieved that misfortune? Have we not since had other Generals to supply his place, and other armies more numerous than his, who might at least have obtained a foothold in Canada, if the conquest of it was so easy a matter as was represented? As to the disaffection of the people in the Eastern States, it is well known that a great proportion of the people in those States are opposed to the war; but it will not be pretended, that they have not promptly complied with all Constitutional requisitions in support of it, except, indeed, by some in the refusal mentioned of the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut to furnish the detachments of militia required. And surely it would be attaching too much importance to their refusals, to consider them as paralyzing the energies of the whole nation. On this subject, Mr. Speaker, as gentlemen have more than once alluded to it, I would wish they would spare their remarks, and more especially their censures, until it is brought regularly before the House, if such step should be deemed advisable; then, perhaps, more may be said upon it than they have anticipated. And if those States shall consider Congress to have competent jurisdiction of the subject, they will probably acquiesce in any determination that, in their opinion, may comport with the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, and not be incompatible with the rights of sovereignty reserved to them by that instrument. Perhaps this remark may be thought irrelevant to the subject immediately under consideration; if so, I can only plead as my apology, the practice of other gentlemen, and particularly the example of the honorable Speaker; who, I recollect, in his able speech on the subject of the Merchants' Bonds, took occasion to advert to the disasters of the war—the cause of them—and to comment with some severity upon the conduct of Massachusetts and Connecticut for refusing obedience to the requisition of the General Government. I think also he went so far as to pronounce an eulogium upon his friend from Kentucky, for his patriotic zeal and soldier-like conduct in a late expedition against the Indians. I do not mention this with a view of casting the least degree of censure upon the Speaker for his, but only as an excuse, if necessary, for my own digression.

But I will proceed to state, as I promised to do when I rose, very concisely, some of the reasons which will induce me to give my vote against the bill now under consideration. And, sir, my objections are grounded in a want of faith—an entire disbelief that the twenty thousand men proposed to be raised for the term of twelve months can be adequate to the objects for which they were said to be wanted.

I know that the Chairman of the Military Committee, who has doubtless paid great attention to the subject, is perfectly confident that these twenty thousand men, and the thirty-five thousand men already raised and to be raised, are competent to carry on our offensive war with success and afford all needed protection to every part of the country. And he certainly seemed to take a commanding view of the whole ground, when he addressed the House. I own, sir, I was struck with admiration at the facility and precision with which the honorable gentleman arranged and disposed of this force in different directions for the purpose of offence and defence. The whole nation seemed, indeed, at once to be "put into an armor and an attitude demanded by the crisis." We were, with this fifty-five thousand men, not only to be guarded at every vulnerable point at home, but prepared to extend our conquests abroad whenever we pleased.

But, Mr. Speaker, I would ask whether any gentleman, upon cool reflection, can bring himself to believe, that if, with all the force of every description which has been employed the Summer past—if, with the militia, regular troops and volunteers, we have not been able to gain a single inch of ground, but lost a territory—I would ask, if it is seriously believed, that with the force relied on for that purpose, we shall be able in a single campaign to conquer all the British provinces in America? No further dependence, it is said, can be placed on militia or volunteers—all expectation of further aid from them is abandoned. The war is now to be carried on solely by regular troops. But how much preferable in point of discipline or any other point of view will be the raw troops now to be raised to ordinary militia? But we are told that our ill success has been owing to our officers. Our men are brave and would have been victorious, but we have had bad Generals. How many are meant to be included in the epithet, I do not know: one has been the most openly denounced in this House.

JANUARY, 1813.

Whether any or what change is to be made in the line of officers it is impossible for me to say. But, as there appears to have been an error of judgment in the appointment of some of our officers, what security is there that we may not suffer further from the same cause?—I say error of judgment; for it is not to be presumed, that on the eve of a war, officers would be selected from motives of favoritism. Suppose, then, that another General should prove unworthy, and from that or from some other cause we should fail of accomplishing all that is necessary to bring the war to a successful close the next campaign, what are we to do then? Raise another army of twenty thousand twelve-months men, and so continue to carry on the war? Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that those who have the management of affairs either are deceived or do not rightly estimate the magnitude of the work they have undertaken in engaging in the war, or are afraid from some cause or other to adopt the measures necessary to prosecute it with any prospect of success. The ground of controversy with Great Britain is indeed greatly narrowed. There is but one point of difference, it appears, remaining. But that is a point which we well know, or ought to know, that she will not yield until reduced to the last extremity—until absolutely compelled to do it. If we therefore persist in our demands we must expect a long and arduous conflict. Great Britain will no doubt defend to the utmost her possessions in America; and while we are attempting to wrest them from her, she will not probably on her part be idle elsewhere.

If gentlemen are determined to persevere in this war, they ought to sit down and deliberately count the cost and prepare their means.

We must, I apprehend, have more durable armies than twelve-months men. But, sir, I do not purpose to trespass upon any of the Parliamentary rules mentioned by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) by proposing any amendment to the present bill. Much less does it come within my purpose to point out the course of measures proper to be pursued. But when a specific proposition is submitted to the House, I presume it cannot be thought incorrect for any gentleman to express his sentiments upon it, and suggest such objections as present themselves to his mind.

And I do apprehend, as I have attempted summarily to show—to say nothing of the impolicy of the war or the objections arising from the structure and genius of our Government to engaging at any time in offensive war—I do believe that the force proposed by this bill to be now raised, when added to that we already have, will be totally inadequate to the objects of offence and defence contemplated; that if we rely upon it we shall be again disappointed; that, instead of redeeming the honor of the nation, we shall be in danger of further defeats and disasters, of sacrificing more men and more money, and of plunging, if possible, still deeper into disgrace.

Mr. GOLD said the annals of this Government, the last six months, commencing with the declaration of war, would be found the most interesting, the most deplorable.

In that period, we have seen a war declared, precipitately and prematurely; for, notwithstanding all the arguments urged on that occasion, with so much zeal and eloquence, time has dissipated all; the illusions have vanished; your army, so confidently expected, did not, under the magic of that declaration, spring into existence; the condition of your enlistments would not, I apprehend, at this hour, justify the declaration of war. We have seen, sir, that war conducted in a manner well to comport with the spirit in which it was declared; disaster upon disaster in rapid succession have followed; the tone and heart of the country broken; universal disgust at the past, and deep concern and anxiety for the future prevail everywhere.

And what, Mr. Speaker, is now proposed for the future—what is to retrieve our affairs—on what are our hopes to rest? An army of twelve-months men! A broken reed! An army and term of service, which well nigh lost the country in the Revolutionary war; an army which in every step and stage of that war received the uniform and reiterated censure and condemnation of Washington, and every intelligent officer of that period; an army that stands recorded by every historian of that war with deep reproach and reprobation. Such is the foundation of our future hopes; shutting our eyes upon the lessons of experience, we live but to repeat former errors and renew our sufferings. Shall we never learn, that a soldier is not the creature of an hour; that he must be seasoned to the hardships of war; that to remove your recruit from his fireside, from his plentiful board, and all the comforts with which he is surrounded, to the theatre of service, there to sleep on the ground in tents, with two or three articles of subsistence only, is to give him up a victim to disease, to consign him to the grave? This precise result is presented to the mind by the melancholy review of the last campaign; disease and death have walked abroad in our armies on the frontier; they have been swept to the grave as by the besom of destruction. It has not stopped with your army; the frontier inhabitants, infected by the diseases of the camp, fly from the deadly theatre as from a destroying angel! Shall we never learn the difference between our situation, and that of nations who have a competent military establishment, sufficient at all times for both offensive and defensive operations?

The slender Military Establishment of the United States, whilst it consults economy, and favors the genius of the Government, forbids a hasty resort to war, especially extra-territorial and offensive war; time for preparation, after the measure is resolved on, is indispensable; and a disregard of our situation in this respect cannot fail to produce defeat and disaster—to produce such a campaign as has just now closed,

But, Mr. Speaker, wherefore change the term of enlistment, from five years, or during the war, to one year? The sole avowed object of the war by land was the conquest of the Canadas. Are you at this hour nearer your object than on the day you declared war, or has that object, with a steady and sure pace, constantly receded from you as you have advanced in the war? Is Canada so far conquered that you can now reduce the term of enlistment? It is impossible to shut our eyes on the past; while all is disgust and despondency with our own citizens—sick of the past, and concerned for the future; while every post brings to the Cabinet fearful and alarming changes in the sentiments of the people under this ill-fated war; your enemy, the Canadians, take courage, their wavering sentiments have become resolved, and union in defence of their firesides, the land that gives them bread, is spreading and cementing all in the patriotic vow.

There was a time, sir, when you had friends in the Upper Province; there were many who wished well to your arms, and would have greeted your approach; but that ill-fated policy which precipitated everything, which in zeal for the end overlooked the means, has blasted all our hopes from that quarter. The Canadian, while he knows your power, distrusts your wisdom and your capacity to conduct the war; he dares not commit himself, his all, to such auspices. Hence, sir, difficulties thicken on every side, and at least three times the force is now necessary to effect the conquest, which would have been required at the commencement of the war. Have we made an impression on the Prince Regent and his Ministry? are they now more disposed to succumb and accept your terms than before the war? How stand the people of the British Empire? Instead of their coercing the Government into our terms, which we fondly anticipated, the late election to Parliament shows them disposed to go hand in hand with the Government in resisting our claims, and inflicting on us all the evils of war. "Maritime Rights" are echoed and re-echoed with applause throughout the Empire. Such, sir, are the bitter fruits of your policy, and to what farther point the same hand shall conduct the destinies of the country, remains to be seen.

I seek not to aggravate the misconduct of the war, nor to commend our enemies, but only wish, sir, that we may see things as they are, our actual situation, and thus look danger in the face. Do you persevere in the conquest of Canada? Pass not the barrier with an army of less than forty-five or fifty thousand men; if you do, in my apprehension, the defeats and disasters of the past campaign will be visited upon you; another army will be made to pass under the yoke, and at the end of the year, you will find yourself still further removed from your object. The tug of war is now placed fairly before us, we cannot advance without meeting it. Such, Mr. Speaker, are the grounds on which I object to this twelve-months army; it is not adapted to the professed object of the war, the conquest of Canada. Is there, sir, any other object in contemplation of the Government; any other land of leeks and onions, which Heaven has given us, or to which our destinies lead? Is the South of easier access than the North, and is the circle of hostility to be extended to that quarter? We profess a pacific policy; moderation and justice are our boast; let us beware how we commit to the hazard this high and enviable character; how we yield, on specious grounds, to the mad and destructive policy which we reprobate in others; a policy which has in all periods overwhelmed nations with calamity, and swelled the tide of human misery. But it is said, that Mr. Russell, late Chargé d'Affaires at St. James, has evinced the moderation of our Government, that he tendered to the British Minister a proposition which, by excluding British seamen from our vessels, would cut up the dispute by the roots. Is the fact so? Had Mr. Russell or the President authority to stipulate? If he had not, if all he could offer must be subject to the Legislative discretion of Congress, acting under the impulse of war, the tender was nugatory and void. Why this proposition was not made before the declaration of war, before the passions were kindled into a blaze, I have never been able to discover. We all remember how frequently the diplomatic notes passed between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster in the months of May and June last; how each Government exerted itself, through its agents, to profess and show its disposition to peace and reconciliation, to obviate difficulties, and make concessions, and present its claims in the most moderate and least exceptionable form. Wherefore was this proposition, at that all important period, held in reserve? Why is the blaze of war first kindled and then the olive branch thrust into the flame? I should be loth to believe, that you withhold when it would be received, and offer only when the passions are worked up to a point to refuse. The subject requires explanation; propositions agitated at a former period, under a different Minister, will not satisfy the candid inquirer on this point. But, sir, though the proposition be made informally and at a late and inauspicious hour, it is, in my conception, the bounden duty of those who have made it, and place so much stress and boast upon it, to make good the tender, by passing the requisite laws to give effect to the proposition, and make it binding; or, in other words, to give to the President power to stipulate for the exclusion of British seamen from our vessels. The result of such an overture, will, in my apprehension, much depend on the spirit of candor and fairness in which it is made. In any event, and in whose ever hands the Government may be, the people of the United States will not long maintain a war, at the present enormous expense, for the single article of impressment, especially if the redress can be obtained by the exclusion of British seamen from our service. But if, Mr. Speaker, the appeal to arms for redress is to be persevered in, there are considerations in a review of the past, which forbid a hope of the speedy return of peace, at least in the life and continuance of the army raised by this bill. Nothing touches the passions and sinks so deep in the heart of a belligerent as the departure of a neutral from his duty, and siding with his adversary; such a belief in Englishmen, of the conduct of this Government, whether well or ill-founded, cannot fail to prolong the war.

I fear there are points in our neutral course, in our relative conduct towards Great Britain and France, which will not bear examination. You proclaimed the Berlin and Milan decrees revoked, and put upon Great Britain the threatened alternative of non-intercourse. Was the fact so? You took a promise for the fact; you proclaimed the fact, while France herself, the author of the deed and party to be benefited, denies and disowns it as done at the time. Here was a fatal error; a departure from the straight line of justice; and when our error in this was palpable to all the world, we gave no explanation, no excuse, but persevered in a measure which led to war. It is this course, sir, this departure from even-handed neutrality between Great Britain and France, that has lost you the support of your own citizens to a great and alarming extent, and, at this moment, sustains the British Ministry in the hearts of Englishmen. It is this belief of our Government's leaning to France, that has carried that Ministry so triumphantly through the late elections to Parliament.

If anything could add to the gloom and sicken the mind under the prospect before us, it is the inauspicious conjunction of events. America and France both making war at the same time on Great Britain; we making the enemy of France our enemy, and this at the ill-fated moment when the all-grasping Emperor of that country is rolling a baleful cloud, charged with destruction, north upon the Russian Empire; upon a Power always just to America; upon our truest and best friend in the European theatre. Against such a friend, at such a period, we have beheld the march of the Corsican through rivers of blood; his footsteps are traced over the ashes of the proudest cities, and he sits himself down, at length, at Moscow, like Marius over the ruins of Carthage.

Mr. M. CLAY said he was opposed to the passage of the bill in its present shape, but for reasons very different from those urged by the gentlemen who had last spoken, (Mr. MOSELEY and Mr. GOLD.) His objection to it was, that it was following the unfortunate policy pursued in the commencement of the Revolution, in the shortness of the term of enlistments, which is the greatest misfortune that can befall a nation at war, in the arrangement of its military concerns. Our first men during the Revolutionary war, said Mr. C., were enlisted for six weeks; our next for three months; our next for six months; our next for nine months; the next for twelve months; the next for two years, then for three, and, lastly during the war. But every man who went out to serve under those short enlistments and returned, brought disgust home with him. Some gentlemen thought, when war was declared last year, that it could be carried on by volunteers, and that they were to end the war directly. You see the bad policy of this now. And if you pass this bill, enlistments will be defeated by those hostile to your measures, or the movements of this force will be procrastinated, till the year expires without their having done you any service. An army is a mere machine, and you must give time for its perfection, until it is prepared for operation, as the machine from the hand of a master workman. You cannot do what you wish with one year's men; it is impossible. You will run the country to a great expense for no benefit, and will disgust the men who shall have entered the army. Go on with your enlistments for the full term of five years. Whether the war be a bad one or good one, you must unite and get out of it. The only way to insure success is to unite. As to speaking of the people of the provinces withdrawing themselves from the British sway, it was idle to expect it unless they were assisted by our measures. It had been our misfortune, from our inexperience in the art of war, like most young people, not to make proper calculations at its commencement. The militia had refused to cross the lines, and would be totally inefficient for the purpose of carrying on the war, as had been foretold by men of experience. Speaking of militia, Mr. C. said, a bill had been reported to the House for classing the militia, which had always been a favorite object with him, and he believed that was the only way in which the militia could be made effectual. On the present occasion, he said, he regretted to see so able a body treading step by step in those early measures of the Revolution which had proved inefficacious. The money already expended on the militia and volunteers had answered no end but to disgust themselves and neighbors; and it always would be the case with men enlisted for short terms of service. Mr. C. concluded by moving to strike out "one year," (the term of enlistment,) and insert "during the war."

Mr. FISK was opposed to the motion, and should himself almost give up the bill if it prevailed. He asked the attention of the House for a moment to a comparison between the present state of the country and the commencement of our Revolution. What was that period, and what were the objects of the war? We were then colonies to Great Britain, not calculating on separation from the mother country, but on resistance to her oppressions. You will find, sir, on looking into history, that this was the course of the First Congress which met. Great Britain then not only claimed and exercised jurisdiction over these States, but had armies in the country, and it was not until independence was declared that it became a serious war. The war then progressed slowly; the difficulties were encountered which have been adverted to by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLAY,) until Great Britain became involved in a war with all Europe, and was obliged to withdraw her forces from our shores. Our situation is now very different. No man, sir, believes that Britain can maintain an army here now. How long will it take us with an ample force to overthrow Canada? It will be as easily done in one year with sufficient force, as in three years with less than an adequate force. The mere diseases of the army will waste more men in encampments in three years, than taking the country in one year's hard fighting will dilapidate it. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MOSELEY) has referred to an observation which I made at the last session, that the people of Canada were ready to conquer themselves, which he treats as having been visionary. You have been told by gentlemen themselves that they were ready to join you, but your disasters have enlightened them. And to prove the truth of what I said at the last session, I would refer to the first proclamation of General Hull on entering Canada, under which five or six hundred men flocked to your standard; but, owing to the cowardice or something else of your General, they were surrendered. Had he behaved properly, Upper Canada would have been yours now.

As to the motion before us, sir, to strike out "one year" and insert "five years" as the term of enlistment, we cannot get men quickly for three or five years, and it is well known we can get them for one. The gentlemen say, they wish a respectable force. This bill, sir, offers the very best means and the only means of speedily obtaining it.

With regard to the relations of this country with Great Britain, and the opinion of the people of that country, and their disposition now to support their Government, I agree with the gentleman that they always will; and I am sorry, sir, that the impartial pen of the historian must record that in this free country are to be found men who advocate the cause of a foreign country and condemn everything done in their own. I am sorry to hear it said on this floor, sir, that we have no cause of war, and had better go home. I was sorry to hear an excuse made for the refusal of the British Government to accept the pacification last offered, that Mr. Russell's powers were deficient. How, sir, are we to expect the conclusion of a war, if it be not through our accredited agents? Why did not the gentleman say, that if the British Ministry doubted his authority, they might still have approved his propositions? Why did they notify Mr. Russell that it was a subject on which they did not choose to negotiate? What apology can be made for an enemy that has treated us in every instance with injury, insult, neglect, and contempt? And yet we hear her defended! It is strange, sir, how the same gentlemen who apologize for her feel towards Russia at this moment. When a mission to Russia was spoken of a year or two ago, they said it was unadvisable because she was at war with Great Britain; and now that she is in alliance with Great Britain, she has their warmest affection. These things, sir, speak for themselves; the people cannot be blinded to them; it is too late for such conduct; the funeral has gone by.

I should be extremely sorry if this bill should be lost. It embraces the only efficient force you can get. When you shall have conquered the Provinces with its aid, you will have enough five years' men to maintain the posts in them. You want now a sufficient force to overrun the Provinces. Ten thousand men will be enough for the upper province, fifteen thousand for the lower, with the exception of Quebec. Of all descriptions of forces, that proposed by the bill will be the best for the times. They will be willing to enter for one year; and submit to discipline. If it be changed to five years, the object will be defeated entirely. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion on further consideration.

Mr. WIDGERY said he would vote for the motion to amend if the gentleman from Virginia would so amend it as to move to substitute eighteen for twelve months' enlistment. I should have no hopes of getting troops for the next Summer's campaign, should such an alteration take place as to make the enlistment during the war; but to alter the bill from twelve to eighteen months' enlistment would meet my wishes much better than it now does. I fully agree with the gentleman from New York, that the time of enlistment is too short, although, had I brought forward the amendment, I am sure the gentleman and his friends would not have supported me—his argument must, therefore, be set down to the side of opposition. Sir, if you enlist men for twelve months only, before you can get them disciplined and concentrated to any one point, so as to be useful, one half your time of enlistment would be out. Sir, if it is as gentleman say, the men can be enlisted by the last of May—with an enlistment for eighteen months you can have two campaigns, while in the other case of twelve months, you can have but one campaign. The only reason I have heard against it is, that you must be at double the expense for clothing, &c. Sir, the answer to this is given in your bill—if not sooner discharged. If your business is finished in one year, you can discharge them as well as if you had enlisted them but for one year—and eighteen months is so short a time that you may get them for that time, if you can get them at all. Many unforeseen accidents may happen to prevent your accomplishing your undertaking the first campaign, which may make it necessary to attempt a second; for which reason, notwithstanding I am opposed to amending from twelve months to an enlistment for during the war, if the gentleman chooses to alter it to eighteen months, I will go with him; otherwise, I must vote against the motion, because I do not think it will answer the purposes for which the bill is intended, as men commonly choose to have a time fixed in their enlistment.

Mr. BOYD said he rose to offer his sentiments on the question now before the House and the bill generally. Sir, said he, I do not expect to make one proselyte to my opinion. I know how difficult it is to persuade predetermined men. All I ask is an impartial hearing from the Speaker and the House; in that I will hope to be indulged. I will try to take a comprehensive view of the past, the present, and from that look to the future. When war was declared last session it is well known that I gave my voice against it, because I thought it premature—that we were altogether unprepared. What has the event proven? That, in that I was at least correct. It was altogether a mistaken zeal for the attainment of what we called our rights. Having made that mistake, I could and do most seriously hope that our disasters would arrest our sanguinary progress, and not plunge ourselves still deeper and deeper in such unpromising, and, in my view, ruinous measures. As near as my memory serves me, the expressions of many gentlemen in the majority, last session, were loudly and constantly reiterated; that the spirit of the nation was up, and demanded of us that we should declare war, and give them an opportunity to revenge the wrongs and the insults of their injured country; that they would rush to the American standard, to the tented field, and to danger; that the militia would, if permitted, take the Canadas; the volunteers with their high spirit of patriotism would do it. Well, sir, they have been let loose; is it done? No, sir; nor will it be done short of a regular force equal to the magnitude of the undertaking. When the war was declared, perhaps we had five thousand men—I believe not more—to defend three thousand miles of a savage frontier, including Canada. Will any man say that our force was equal to the attainment of the thing proposed? The honorable Chairman of the Military Committee acknowledges he has been deceived in his calculations with respect to the prowess and high martial spirit of the militia and volunteers, (I have not,) and hence that Committee, through their Chairman, recommends the raising twenty new regiments to be enlisted for one year, and, that is, according to the present view, to achieve the grand object. No, sir, not in my mind. I will ask, will your numbers on paper conquer the British possessions in America? No, sir; we have tried that, to the conviction of every man in America that will think at all, and to our disgrace; beware of the second attempt of the same kind. Mr. Speaker, I ventured last session to say that it would require fifty thousand disciplined troops to complete the reduction of the Canadas, including Quebec. That idea was much scouted at that time. I am now fortified in that opinion by a majority of the House. And the question is, how are you to get them? I answer, not by the present bill in its present form. I join with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLAY) who says that by short enlistments you never can have an army in the field that can be depended upon. What said the late General WASHINGTON on that subject, in his letters to Congress in the Revolutionary war, whom we all respect as our first authority? It is this, that short enlistments gave you men to feed and clothe, and that their time was spent in collecting, marching to camp, and returning home; that they could not be disciplined; and, when with the army for a short period, could not be relied upon, and, therefore, advised enlistments for more extensive periods, or for during the war. I hope that this will be thought good authority. In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, with your leave, I will mention a discourse that took place between General Wilkinson and myself some few days before he left this city last Summer, as I think it in point to my present purpose; it was this: I observed to him that I was desirous of asking him a question, but was not sure that it was a proper one; that, howsoever, I did not mean that it should be otherwise, and that he must be the judge. He replied: your question, sir. It is this; if we had at this time thirty thousand troops enlisted and here at Washington, would you undertake to reduce the Canadas, including Quebec, to obedience to the United States, in one campaign? He said, do you wish an answer to that question? If agreeable to you, sir. I have no hesitation in answering you, sir, said he, and then said, I should not like to risk my reputation on it. This I give as an additional authority for the opinions that I advance on the present question. Sir, I am as little inclined to relinquish my rights or the rights of the American people as any gentleman on this floor; but what they are and how they may be best defended, for me is a different and an important question. Do I doubt the zeal and patriotism of the honorable Chairman that reported and those that support the bill? I do not; but the proposition appears to me to be plunging the country into more and more difficulty, and, therefore, objectionable. Sir, when the Chairman was called upon as to the number of troops that we had actually now in service, he answered that the committee had the returns that would satisfactorily answer that inquiry, and that the reason it had not been exhibited was, that the committee thought it inexpedient; but if any member would call on the committee, the sight of the papers should be at their service. Sir, I want no secrets; it requires no great depth of judgment to define why it is inexpedient; the language is but too plain; and will you now add twenty regiments before you know whether the men are to be got or not—increasing our national debt beyond calculation? If it is necessary to have such an army you are to remember that they must be paid—with what? Money? No; that you have not got. Will you tax the people? No. Why not? The reason is too plain. I wish not to involve the country in an irredeemable debt. If the national debt of England be a sore calamity to that people, and a grievance almost insupportable, as I believe it is, and I think cannot be denied; and yet, sir, we are treading exactly in her steps; I feel that you are mortgaging my property and that of my posterity for what perhaps you can never obtain. What is it? Why, that a few stripes at the mast-head of any ship shall be a protection to everything on board, whether enemy's or contraband of war, contrary to the usage of all Europe for three centuries. I do not say that England will not relinquish a part of her claims. I think that it is more than probable that she may, but why will she do so? Because that by such an agreement she is furnished with the vast advantage of vending to the United States sixty millions of dollars worth of her manufactures, and receiving the best payment from us of any part of the world, and most suitable to her internal welfare. If she does, and I hope she will, those are her motives, and not your land conquests, that will compel her to yield to our demands.

Sir, I am sensible that I am taking a greater latitude than might be thought strictly correct; but I hope that I shall be pardoned when I say that I think the subject demands and requires it of me. I know that it may be said to me, that it is much easier to find fault with what is offered, than to point out a better way. Sir, I think that might easily be done, in either of two several ways; and I shall attempt it before I sit down. But before I do that, let us examine what advantage those provinces would be to us. For argument, I will suppose a sufficient force before the walls of Quebec—further, suppose it surrendered to your arms, with all the upper country—how many men must you keep in pay to garrison and to keep it? And what use will it be to us unless you have Halifax also—and that you cannot take or keep without a superior naval force? Have we got that? No; the timber is as yet growing that is to form that part of our force—and without it your Canadas are worse than nothing. Sir, I am not a correct geographer, but I understand that the St. Lawrence is the natural outlet for one-half of New Hampshire, great part of Vermont, a considerable part of New York, much of Pennsylvania, and some part of Ohio. Whence is the produce of all that country, that I have been describing, to find its way out, whilst your enemy has the command of the river? Ah! but, say the advocates of the present bill and the war, we have other force to rely on—our privateers will so annoy and distress their trade that that will bring them to our terms. I will ask, if this is not in contradiction to themselves? England, with a fleet superior to all Europe, cannot protect her commerce against our private armed ships, say they. And I grant it. And then I ask, how we are, with our small force, to protect our trade against their privateers and men of war? Sir, the argument is conclusive against themselves by their own showing.

Sir, last session, when we were flattering ourselves with those delusive hopes that the militia was to achieve everything, then the volunteers were to do all that was necessary, it was my misfortune not to see things in quite so pleasing a point of view; I still labor under that misfortune; then New Hampshire was to take the Canadas—Vermont, only give her liberty, she would take it—Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Kentucky, they would do it—

[Here the SPEAKER observed to Mr. BOYD, that he was not in order; the question before the House was on the amendment. Mr. BOYD gave way and did not finish his observations.]

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, and negatived.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out one and insert five years as the term of enlistment. He regretted as much as any one the disasters which had befallen the country; and there was but one way to obviate their effects, and that was by rising superior to them, as a part of the nation had already done—he meant the Western country, where a patriotism had been exhibited equal to that which might have distinguished Rome in its best days. Their zeal was equal to their bravery—and the only drawback on their enterprise was the difficulty of finding something to eat in the wilderness. We must rise after reverses. What, sir, said Mr. M., would have become of Rome, had she desponded when Hannibal defeated her armies? She rose upon it, and became the mistress of the world. What would have been the situation of our cause in the Revolution, if, after the British successes in Jersey, we had desponded? But the men of Pennsylvania and New Jersey rose on it, and victory and triumph followed. Our object now ought to be to recover the ground we have lost, and meet the enemy with troops that will insure success. We are told, sir, this war has united England to a man. Sir, I never expected aid from our enemies. Let us follow so good an example, and unite to a man; let us remember the old Continental maxim—"united we stand, divided we fall." If we were as united in defence of our rights, as England is in her usurpations, this war would not last a single campaign—and I hope in this respect, we shall at least, learn wisdom from an enemy. The calculations about one or two campaigns, however, in present circumstances, are visionary. We have engaged an enemy not in the habit of yielding very soon. But, if we were to unite, the question would soon be settled. The cause and object of this war has been more concisely stated by one of those actively engaged in it, than by any other person—I mean Captain Porter's motto—"free trade and sailors' rights;" no man could have given a better definition of it. It appears to me that one part of this Continent ought to be zealous for the rights of seamen—another part for a free export trade; and, if we were, as we ought to be, united, the war would be carried on with energy and with success. I agree with the gentleman from New Jersey, that this thing is not to be done by paper men. My opinion is, that the best thing we can do, is to raise men for five years. Let the Legislature of the country do its duty. If the thirty-five thousand men now authorized, be not enough, let us get as many as will be adequate to the end we propose. Gentlemen have thought proper to review former transactions. I would be willing to pass them over. I believe almost every measure adopted by the General Government would have had its destined effect if adhered to. You have always got the better of the argument; you have better proclamations; but what avails all this? Britain has impressed your seamen, and given you blows for good words. You have been heretofore told your paper measures were worth nothing: now, that it is proposed to give blow for blow, what is said? That you are departing from the pacific system, which the same persons before reprobated, and to which they have become friendly only after every attempt at pacification has failed. Sir, we are now engaged in war, and we must succeed or we must yield the rights of sailors and free trade. Does any man doubt that the war is justly undertaken? Is there a man in the nation—I care not of what political sect, many as there are—who believes that the war is not undertaken on just grounds—that we had not borne with their indignities till we could have borne them no longer? After plundering your property and impressing your seamen on the ocean, their agents have been sent into this nation to sow divisions among us, who ought to be but one family. What crime has been left undone? What injury have we not suffered? Could one be added to the catalogue? It seems to me not. No man loves peace more than I do, and if it had not been for Great Britain sending her agents to our firesides, I do not know but I should have voted against the war. It seemed to me like an attempt on a man's daughter. Not content with vexing and harassing you whenever you went from home, they came here to put strife into your family. You have been told that the Prince Regent and his Ministers are firm. Sir, we never calculated on their receding, but on the energies and force of the nation to obtain redress, and if we had been united we should have equalled our most sanguine expectations. Let us follow their example, and determine to maintain our national rights, as they do to maintain their usurpations on them.

JANUARY, 1813.

With respect to the term of service, enlistments for one year will look as if we were afraid to go the whole length of the war. Raising men for five years would convince the enemy you meant to maintain and enforce your rights; but while you take men for one year or eighteen months, they will think we are temporizing, and instead of lowering their tone by this means, you will raise it. Exactly as you appear fickle, they will unite, and as you display energy you will disunite them. Do not loosen your grasp in any quarter, but increase it in every way within your power. Mr. M. concluded his remarks by moving to strike out one and insert five.

Mr. M. CLAY seconded the motion of Mr. MAOON to strike out "one year" and insert "five," as the term of enlistment. He said an army ought to be seasoned before it was carried into the field. We have heard much said, observed he, about sickness in your army; much of the sickness, some time ago, at New Orleans, and much lately of the sickness at Plattsburg. Have you ever heard of an army on earth that was carried into the field before it had been seasoned in the camp? It must, to be good for anything, be first disciplined in camp, and become inured to the mode of living and the fare of soldiers. It will take some time to season men to the change in their mode of living which must take place on going into camp. It will take a year to prepare them for the field. Without discipline they will be useless. Your seamen are brave and successful because they know what they go to sea for. Take a landsman on board a ship, and what sort of a sailor will he make? Such as the French have on board their vessels. We take no man into the Navy but who understands his business and the purpose for which he goes there, and we see the effects of it. I do not wish it understood, sir, if I vote against the bill, that I am opposed to the war. No, sir. It is a righteous war, into which I go with hand and heart. We may differ about the mode, but that is all. I speak from experience more than from anything else. Let us raise a sufficient army to serve during the war, be it long or short. It is absurd to suppose that we shall not succeed in our enterprise against the enemy's provinces. We have the Canadas as much under our command as she has the ocean; and the way to conquer her on the ocean is to drive her from the land. I am not for stopping at Quebec or anywhere else; but I would take the whole continent from them, and ask them no favors. Her fleets cannot then rendezvous at Halifax as now, and having no place of resort in the North, cannot infest our coast as they have lately done. It is as easy to conquer them on the land as their whole Navy could conquer ours on the ocean. As to coping with them at sea, we cannot do it. We can annoy them, but not meet them on the open sea. I would meet them and hurt them, however, where we can. We must take the continent from them. I wish never to see a peace till we do. God has given us the power and the means; we are to blame if we do not use them. If we get the continent, she must allow us the freedom of the sea. I hope, sir, the amendment of my friend from North Carolina, going to make this army more efficient, may be adopted.

Mr. PLEASANTS said, before the question was taken, he wished to submit a few of the reasons why he was opposed to the amendment. The question before the House, if he correctly understood it, was not, what were the best materials of which to make an army; whether men for the war, for five years, or for twelve months; but the question was, what is the kind of force, and for what length of time can you raise an army to take the field at the earliest period? I hesitate not a moment, Mr. P. said, to declare, that if it were within the compass of our ability to raise an army for five years by voting it, I would authorize it. Not a moment should I doubt on the subject. The history of the world is strongly in favor of such an army. But we perfectly know, from the progress of the recruiting service, that we have already authorized as many men of that description as we shall probably be able to raise. This force is wanted to render the next campaign efficient. I consider the bill merely as a substitute for the volunteer system heretofore pursued. Of what materials will this army be composed? Of young men ready to volunteer their services for one year in the form of regulars; and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, men will enlist in this corps who would not enlist for five years, or for the war. I am sanguine in the opinion, that this measure, if now adopted, will do away the defects of the present volunteer system, and I am fully of opinion, that under it, a force may be drawn into the field ready to act efficiently in the next campaign. I am not one of those, sir, notwithstanding the accounts we have heard of our disasters, who despair of the Republic. If we turn to history we shall find that we have never engaged in any war in which we have come out better in the first campaign than we have in this. Look at the war undertaken under the auspices of Gen. Washington against the Indians. What was the history of it? We all recollect the campaign under Harmar, and its bloody scenes. The campaign under St. Clair cannot be forgotten. We then suffered defeat upon defeat, disaster upon disaster, in the course of the war, which was not terminated till the Treaty of Greenville, in 1795, though it may be said to have virtually terminated by the defeat of the Indians by General Wayne, which occurred previous to the treaty. If this country be willing to go into the contest heart and hand, we shall, in a very short time, demonstrate to the enemy all we want to convince her of, that it is in reality her interest to be at peace with this country. I hope, sir, the motion to amend the bill will not prevail. I am perfectly convinced that the bill as it is will enable us to call a valuable force into service, and I am sanguine in the hope, that, with its aid, together with the other force we shall have, we may clear the continent of the enemy's dominion in one campaign, though I do not undertake to predict that we shall.

The question was then taken on Mr. Macon's proposed amendment, and lost.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill to a third reading.

MR. PEARSON said, not unfrequently it happens, Mr. Speaker, both in private and political life, that men of the clearest perceptions and most correct motives, experience much difficulty and embarrassment in determining on the course best to be pursued, or the application of means best calculated to produce a given object. The object most devoutly wished for by myself, and, no doubt, equally desired by every honest and honorable man in this community, is, that my country should once more be restored to the enjoyment of peace. Under the pressure of existing circumstances, involved in a war with a powerful nation—a war now prosecuted for a doubtful, or, at least, strongly controverted question of national right—a war, the prosecution of which, so far as relates to our military operations, has everywhere, and on all occasions, been attended with disgrace, defeat, or disaster; under such circumstances, I confess, sir, I am not free from embarrassment in determining on the course demanded by genuine patriotism, or best calculated to restore the blessings of peace to the country. I rejoiced to hear the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS) declare, the other day, that his object was also peace. It must be a source of gratification to the country to learn that some of the strongest advocates for the declaration of war begin now to think and talk of peace.

The honorable gentleman, however, urges the passage of the bill under consideration (which authorizes the enlistment of twenty thousand additional regular troops for one year; and provides for the appointment of proportionably an unusual number of officers, with all the accompanying paraphernalia of an army,) as the means best calculated to produce the end in view. Did I believe, sir, that the passage of this bill, or (what is more difficult and less likely to happen) the actual enlistment of the proposed additional force, would secure to us our object, I would not only consent to give this force, but ten times the number, if it were by force alone to be obtained; but when I reflect on the special and sole cause for which it is avowed the war is now prosecuted; when I consider the relative strength, situation, and disposable force, by sea and land, of the two nations, and especially when my recollection is assailed (for we cannot, nor ought we to, close our senses against such damning facts) with the heretofore scanty enlistments; the confusion and insubordination which has pervaded many parts of your army; the extraordinary expense already incurred, and the uniform disasters which have marked all your military operations, I cannot bring my mind to the belief that the force now proposed can produce any desirable effect.

MR. SPEAKER: As much as I was opposed to the declaration of war, and as much as subsequent events have convinced me of the correctness of the vote I gave on that momentous question, it is not my purpose on this occasion to question the policy of that unfortunate act. My mind is bent on peace; to that object my efforts are directed. The impression is strongly fixed on my understanding, that this war can be terminated with honor and advantage to this nation, without the further effusion of human blood. If so, surely no Christian will deny but justice, humanity, and sound policy demand that nothing should remain undone, on our part, to stop this career of carnage and bloodshed. I have said, sir, that it is my impression that this war can be terminated with honor and advantage to this nation, without a further appeal to arms. In stating this opinion, I do not mean to be understood as identifying the honor of the nation with the honor of those by whom the war was declared; or, in other words, I do not admit that the national honor rests solely in the hands of those who may happen to be in the Administration, or who may happen to constitute a majority in Congress. No, sir, this is an elective Government—the power and ultimate responsibility rest with the people; they cannot be dishonored unless they pertinaciously approve of unwise or wicked measures, and continue to support the authors of such measures. It is, therefore, not with me a primary consideration, in the suggestions I am about to make, how far the honor or reputation, for political wisdom, of any individuals may be affected by the adoption of the plan for peace which has occurred to my mind. I do not know that any honorable gentleman will be affected by it, should it be adopted. I hope he will not; to me it is perfectly indifferent who are in power, so that the affairs of the nation are well conducted.

Mr. Speaker: Whatever may have been the original causes for the declaration of this war, we are now taught to believe that the question in contest is reduced to a single point. The British Orders in Council were repealed on the 21st of June, three days after our declaration of war; and of course, without a knowledge of that event, the blockade of May, 1806, had long ceased to exist. The sole avowed cause, therefore, remaining, and for which the war is now carried on, is the practice of impressment from on board our merchant vessels. This subject has for many years engaged the attention of both nations; it has been a fruitful theme of execration and declamation for almost every editor and orator of the age. Great as our cause of complaint may have been, (and I am not disposed to palliate it,) it must be admitted by all who understand the nature and true bearing of the question, that it has been subjected to much exaggeration. Permit me, sir, to remark, that notwithstanding the importance, the difficulty, and delicacy which have been justly attributed to this subject, and the unwillingness at all times manifested on the part of the British Government to abandon or derogate from the abstract right of impressing her own seamen from on board neutral merchant vessels, it is very far from being certain that she has not been willing to enter into such arrangement with this Government, as would place the question of impressment on a basis both safe and honorable to this nation. By a reference to the correspondence of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney with the British Commissioners, which preceded the treaty concluded by those gentlemen in the year 1806, but which was unfortunately rejected by the then President, it is evident that the interest of impressment was, in the opinion of those gentlemen, placed on a footing well calculated to secure our own seamen from the abuse against which we had complained, and against which it was our duty to protect them. This opinion was not only expressed in forcible and decisive language at the time of entering into the arrangement, but repeated by Mr. Monroe more than a year after, in a formal letter to the Secretary of State. The language of that gentleman, now your Secretary of State, is peculiarly emphatic, and must be within the recollection of every gentleman in this House. Without troubling the House with the reading of the documents referred to, it is sufficient for me to state, that your present Secretary of State did, in a letter addressed to Mr. Madison, dated February 23, 1808, declare "that he always believed, and did still believe, that the ground on which the interest of impressment was placed by the paper of the British Commissioners of the 8th of November, 1806, and the explanations which accompanied it, was both honorable and advantageous to the United States."

Thus, sir, as we have conclusive evidence of a disposition on the part of the British Government, at one period at least, to advance considerable length towards an adjustment of this long contested question; and as we have no evidence that different principles and claims are now asserted from those then advanced; I think it fair to conclude, that it is still in our power to put an end to this controversy with safety to our seamen, and advantage to the nation. Instead, then, of passing this bill, and spending the blood and treasure of our countrymen in the prosecution of this war, I conceive it our duty to make an effort for the sanction of our just rights, and the restoration of peace, without a further appeal to force. It is my decided opinion that such an effort, if fairly and liberally made by this House, and the Executive branch of the Government, would not fail in producing the desired effect.

The peculiar nature of the question, which now constitutes the sole object for continuing the war; the intimation given by the Executive in the correspondence with the British Government, since the declaration of war, together with the opinions stated by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, in their letter to the Secretary of State of January 3, 1807, all tend to confirm me in the belief, that it is the duty of Congress to pass a law which would not only check desertions from the British service, by excluding persons of that description from employ in our service, but also deprive the British Government of the apology alleged for impressing American seamen, by excluding British subjects from the commercial and public service of the United States. Having alluded to the letter of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney of the 3d of January, 1807, I will take the liberty of reading from it a short extract. After stating the opinion they had formerly expressed, that although the British Government did not feel itself at liberty to relinquish formally, by treaty, its claim to search our merchant vessels for British seamen, its practice would nevertheless be essentially, if not completely, abandoned, they observe: "That opinion has since been confirmed by frequent conferences on the subject with the British Commissioners, who have repeatedly assured us that, in their judgment, we were made as secure against the exercise of their pretension by the policy which their Government had adopted, in regard to that very delicate and important question, as we could have been made by treaty. It is proper to observe, however, that the good effect of this disposition, and its continuance, may depend, in a great measure, on the means which may be taken hereafter by the Congress to check desertions from the British service. If the treaty is ratified, and a perfect good understanding is produced by it between the two countries, it will be easy for their Governments, by friendly communications, to state to each other what they respectively desire, and in that mode to arrange the business as satisfactorily as it could be done by treaty."

Thus, sir, had the treaty of 1806 been ratified and a good understanding been produced between the two countries, Congress were warned, even in that event, that it was their duty to lend their aid in rendering effectual and perpetual any arrangement which might be made on this subject of impressment. As to the late communications from the Executive department, made to the British Government, since the declaration of war, it is not my intention at this time to enter into a particular examination of their merit or demerit. I will barely remark, that to me they present a novelty in the history of war and diplomacy. Propositions, alleged to be of a pacific nature, made in six days after the declaration of war! Such a procedure (much as I desire peace and much as I was opposed to the war) is to my mind, to say the least, extremely extraordinary, and its policy incomprehensible. It is the more so from the circumstance of a British Minister being on the spot at the moment of declaring the war and keeping up a continued correspondence with the Secretary of State to the last moment of the existence of peace. Under such circumstances I should conceive each nation ought to have known the ultimatum of the other and not waited for the form of a declaration of war, to resume the negotiation and give a new shape to their proposition. I confess that I am not surprised at the result of this war negotiation—everything was demanded to be yielded by our enemy, for which the war was declared, even as a preliminary in the first instance to an armistice, and in the second instance as preliminary to a negotiation. The equivalent offered on our part, was of a nature which it was not within the province of the Executive to confirm, and, of course, depended on what Congress might or might not do on the subject. In addition to this, our agent in London, through whom those propositions were made, did not possess regular and competent powers, and was considered by the British Government as incompetent to act with them on such a subject on equal terms of obligation and responsibility. Whatever, therefore, may be my opinion in relation to those late propositions, and however illy calculated they may have been to produce any desirable result, I am far from considering them unworthy the particular attention of this House. I allude particularly to the equivalent proposed as an inducement for the discontinuance of the practice of impressment. Here, for the first time in the whole history of the long protracted discussion on this subject, it is intimated that something effectual will be done on our part to prevent the cause of the abuse of which we complain—a promise is given, in the event of obtaining the concessions demanded, that a law would be passed by Congress to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of the United States. This, then, is what I ask you now to do—pass a law effectually to exclude all British subjects from the public and private maritime service of the United States; let the law be well guarded against the possibility of violation or evasion; and let us be determined rigidly to enforce it; place this law in the hands of your Executive; let him immediately appoint one or more honest, able, independent commissioners; men who neither have nor expect an office; men in whom the nation, without regard to party, would be willing to confide; give them ample powers to form a treaty or arrange the sole question which is now the pivot on which this war depends. Do all this; do it faithfully, and I venture to predict you will obtain a peace, and secure your just rights more speedily, more effectually, and more satisfactorily to the people of this country, than by all the military operations in the compass of your power. If then, after doing everything which, as a just and honorable people we ought to do, not only to secure our own rights, but to guard against doing injury to the rights of others, we should unfortunately fail in obtaining peace and justice, we should then be united in any war for essential rights. Sir, in politics, as well as in morality, the sin of omission is equal to the sin of commission; if others are injured by our neglect, with what propriety can we complain if that injury should happen to be made to recoil upon ourselves—unless, indeed, effectual means are taken to prevent its recurrence? If this position is true, let it be applied to the question now in dispute; and I conceive it must irresistibly follow, that our own hands are not entirely clean, and that it is our duty to make them so, before they are further steeped in blood. Before I enter into the examination of the question of impressment—the only avowed existing object of the war—permit me to declare, as the firm conviction of my understanding, that if this question, as it at present stands, under the peculiar circumstances of the two nations, could be fully and fairly understood by the people of this country, they would not sustain the war in which we are involved for one single hour. No, sir, a war never can, it never ought to be sustained, for the protection of British subjects, or foreigners of any description, who may come among us, unless they remain within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States; on the contrary, if Great Britain will not be satisfied to arrange this subject fairly—so as to exempt us from the abuse of the practice of impressing from our vessels, when such security as is in our power to give, and such as she ought to ask, is given her, that none of her seafaring subjects shall be employed in our public or merchant vessels—then we shall have a cause for war (and be united in it) more worthy of the energies of this nation. How far we have the right, or how expedient it may be for the Legislature, to restrict the claims of one, though very inconsiderable, class of seamen, viz: those British seamen who have, previously to the existing war, been regularly naturalized agreeably to the laws of the United States—how far, I say, it would be Constitutional and just to interfere with the claims and privileges now enjoyed by this particular description of persons, I am not at this moment prepared to say. I believe, however, the number is so inconsiderable, that it would not produce any serious obstacle to an arrangement, which would be otherwise desirable to the two nations. The whole number of seamen of this description, during the whole period from 1796 to 1811 (agreeably to a report of the Secretary of State,) amounts only to 1,332; and from the opinion of gentlemen, well informed on this subject, it is highly probable, at the period of the declaration of war, and perhaps at this moment, there are not one hundred regularly naturalized British seamen in our service. It is probable, therefore, that in a negotiation commenced and prosecuted with friendly dispositions, the abstract question of right might not arise; and if it did, both parties regarding and looking to the future more than the past, would not permit so inconsiderable a practical and past evil to become a serious object of contestation. As to those foreigners who may be hereafter naturalized, we have complete control over the subject; they ought not to have a claim on protection, if they are not content with the blessings of our laws and our land, without placing themselves in the power of their native sovereign. Sir, it would seem, if, indeed, any reliance is to be had on a very extraordinary document, furnished by the Executive during the present session of Congress, purporting to be the detail of an interesting conversation between Mr. Russell and Lord Castlereagh, on the 18th of September last, that Mr. Russell, though not authorized by his Government so to do, did propose that the law to be passed by us and to take effect on the discontinuance of the practice of impressment, should prohibit the employment of the native subjects or citizens of the one State, excepting such only as had already been naturalized, on board the private or public ships of the other. This proposition, although not authorized and not considered as binding on the Executive, is certainly entitled to due consideration by us, from the time and manner of its being made, and the sanction most unquestionably implied from the silence of the Executive in relation to this proposition. Thus, the subject is reduced by the showing of our own Cabinet not so much to the violation of a right, as to the occasional abuse of the exercise of a right.

How, then, does the question really and fairly stand, for which it is alleged this war is and ought to be prosecuted at the hazard of everything dear to a prosperous and happy people? The claim of the British Government is, to take from the merchant vessels of other countries British subjects. We complain that, in the practice, commanders of British ships of war often take from merchant vessels of the United States American citizens. If, then, the right of search is not denied—if the invariable principle of national allegiance and protection is admitted, so far as gives to the Sovereign a right to the services of their native citizens or subjects, in time of war, or when the exigencies of the State may require them—it follows that this practice of impressment from our vessels springs from our employment of her seamen in our merchant service, regardless of the injury inflicted by depriving her of the services of that class of her subjects, more than all others essential to her safety in time of war, and, at all times, to the general prosperity of the nation. This practice being induced and defended for the reasons above stated, will not be relinquished until something is done—some plan adopted—which will remedy the evil complained of, for which impressment is now resorted to. We will have to give something in exchange as the price of such a relinquishment, and nothing can be cheaper than the plan I have proposed.

Will it be contended that this is granting too much? Will it be contended that a neutral flag shall protect everything that sails under it? Surely gentlemen will except articles deemed contraband of war, and armed enemies of a belligerent. They must go further; they must abandon the protection of native subjects of a foreign Power, when they trust themselves beyond our territorial jurisdiction, and thus fall into the hands of their original sovereign. If this is not done, this war must be interminable, at least, while Great Britain has a flag on the ocean. Should we be successful in the contest, the principle will not be sanctioned by any nation regardless of its maritime power, and probably be a curse to ourselves, should we ever possess superior naval prowess. Moreover, in the assertion of such a right, we are entering the lists against the law and practice of perhaps every nation in the world which pretends to regard civilization or law. For, although I admit that all civilized nations recognise, in some form or other, the rights and privileges of naturalization, yet they equally agree in the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, and deny that naturalization, by a foreign Power, gives to the person naturalized any new claims to protection against his own Sovereign. Much less, therefore, are persons to be protected who are bound by no tie to any country, except the tie resulting from allegiance and protection, which is only due to and from the native State.

This, sir, is the doctrine of approved writers on national law; it is the uniform doctrine of Great Britain, and is recognised, not only by the practice of France, but by a variety of statutes and edicts of that country, both before and since the Revolution. She not only denies the right of protection to the naturalized person against his own Sovereign, but denies to neutrals the right to naturalize her enemies, so as to protect them against her arms, and authorizes the seizure of her own seamen on board neutral vessels at sea. Yes, sir, these practices and these pretensions have been enforced upon us by the officers of the French Government in a variety of instances; and, so far from those officers considering it an offence, they have reproached our Government for seducing their seamen into our service; nor have I heard a whisper of complaint on this subject against the French Government. Who is there, that has paid any attention to the proceedings of France on this subject, that is ignorant of the rigid vigilance with which she has endeavored to secure to herself the services of her own seamen, both in peace and war, and the little ceremony with which neutral or naturalized seamen have been treated by her. She makes it a crime in her seamen to serve on board vessels of other nations, whether enemies or friends. She punishes as pirates all masters of vessels, whether naturalized or settled in other countries, who take commissions or use any other flag than that of France. If her seamen are found in foreign ships, in time of peace, they are doomed to confinement and service; if in time of war, they are sentenced to three years in the galleys. These are some of the regulations which exist, and had their origin previous to the Revolution. Since that period, and in the tide of French principles, (for I will not prostitute the term liberty;) other regulations have taken place, which clearly show of what avail our certificates of naturalization or our protection to foreigners would have been, had that nation been able to keep anything like a fleet at sea. By this modern champion of maritime rights, all captains of neutral vessels were punished as spies, unless they could prove by our Minister near the French Court that they were born in an allied or neutral country. All English sailors on board neutral flags in the ports of France were ordered to be arrested, and every man who spoke the English language was to be considered English, unless he could prove by authentic documents that he was an American.

These, sir, are some of the doctrines and practices of France; their cruelty and injustice in many respects must be admitted by all; they transcend any British pretensions which have ever come to my knowledge; they are adduced not to palliate the conduct of the British Government, but to show the conduct of different nations on the subject for which the war is now continued, and principally to show, that whilst we assert the principle that our flag shall be the shield of protection to every foreigner who may take refuge under it, this war will be eternal, if not universal.

One word more, sir, on this part of the subject—it is this: independent of the existence of the war, and the intrinsic delicacy and perplexity of the question of which I have been treating, and setting aside all considerations of injury and abstract right both in relation to ourselves and others, there is something of superior encouragement and patronage due from us to our native tars. National honor and national safety require that your navies and your armies too should be composed of the natives of our soil. It ill befits us to share the toils and honors of defending our country with those who have no interest in it—already has the glory of the late brilliant naval achievement, the capture of the Guerriere by the Constitution, under command of Captain Hull, been somewhat tarnished by the fact, or at least the belief, that a great part of our crew were Britons. Call not foreigners to your aid, let American battles be fought by America's sons; to them impart the honor or the shame.

As to the bill under consideration, I consider it a perfect nullity in point of practical efficiency. It will add to expenses already too great for the people to bear, or this Legislature fairly to provide. For, sir, so tottering are the props of this war, they will fall the instant you touch the pockets of the people in a way which they will see, feel, and understand. I know your reliance is on loans, to aid in providing for the expenditures of the present year, which, if this bill passes, will exceed thirty-five millions of dollars. This mode of getting money may fail, and, if it does not, little comfort is afforded by it to those who look forward to the day of payment. No honest man derives much consolation from being relieved from prompt payment, if a mortgage is rivetted on himself and his posterity. Already you have officers in number sufficient to command thirty-five thousand men, independent of the six hundred which have just sprung up by the bill that was passed yesterday. Suppose (for the sake of argument) that there are at this moment not more than fifteen thousand men enlisted in the present establishment; it follows of course that there are already supernumerary officers sufficient for the command of twenty thousand men, besides the additional six hundred exclusively intended for the recruiting service.

Why then, with so many unemployed officers in commission and pay, (a number almost sufficient to admit of a recruiting officer opening a rendezvous in every county, town, or village in the United States,) shall we have entailed upon us the curse of this additional mass of useless expense? If there is any peculiar charm in the period of twelve months to induce rapid enlistments, after the law which at present exists authorizing the enlistment of fifteen thousand men for eighteen months, let these fifteen thousand and five thousand more if you please be enlisted for twelve instead of eighteen months, and you will have all the men contemplated by this bill without the unnecessary multiplication of officers.

I understand, sir, the present campaign is broken up; no more fighting or attempts on Canada are intended during the Winter. Let your officers, instead of loolling in the tents, or spending their time in amusement, exert themselves in providing a force for the Spring, and if men are disposed to enlist at all, as many can and will be had, in the manner I have mentioned, as there would be if you had a recruiting officer at every man's door in the country.

But, sir, when I consider the intrinsic objections to short enlistments for distant offensive operations; when I reflect on the theatre where this war is to be prosecuted, and the consequence of opposing raw undisciplined troops in contest with veteran soldiers, I cannot avoid expressing my astonishment at the imbecility and wildness of the project contemplated by this bill, and admonish gentlemen of its total inefficacy in bringing nearer to them the object of their wishes.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, in reply to Mr. PEARSON, that he was very happy to find, that the gentleman from North Carolina, while he was unwilling to defend the Irish and Englishmen, yet was willing to promote the war for the American seamen—that the cause was a good one, and he hoped that the other gentlemen who usually acted with him, would unite to defend so brave and meritorious a class of citizens. That as to acting on the subject, he, as a member of the Committee of Foreign Relations, together with some others of that committee, had it under consideration. That his views did not extend farther than the proposition made by our Executive to the British Government. If England would agree to reciprocal exclusion, he would agree for one to limit our protection to native-born seamen and those who are now naturalized. The subject was, however, one of very great delicacy, better fitted for negotiation than legislation, and he had not fully reflected on it—but if, after due deliberation, he found it could be done with propriety, it should be laid before Congress before the end of the session. That he could not agree with the gentleman from North Carolina, that we ought to rely on such provisions, and suspend in the meantime our preparations; that such conduct would be fatal, as England was a proud and high-minded nation, and that nothing could bring her to terms but a vigorous and successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. RHEA made some remarks on the same head; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4.

EDWARD HEMPSTEAD, returned to serve as the Delegate in this House from the Territory of Missouri, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. FINDLEY,
Resolved, That the Speaker address a letter to the Executive of the State of Pennsylvania, communicating information of the death of JOHN SMILIE, late a member of this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby, in the representation from that State.

The bill to confirm the decision of the Commissioners appointed to settle the boundaries of the public lands at West Point, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BURWELL offered the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of fixing by law the value of foreign gold coins within the United States."

Mr. B. observed, that the law which had formerly made those coins a tender in the payment of duties, had been suffered to expire two years since; not having been renewed, under an apprehension that those coins were so far reduced in value as not to be fit for circulation. By the report of the Assayer of the Mint, for the year 1812, laid on the table a few days ago, it appeared that there was no difference in the value of these coins between the present day and the time when the law of 1806 expired, except in those of Spain. There was circulating a quantity of gold coin in the country, which frequently fell into the hands of those unacquainted with the expiration of the law, who took it at its full value, and thereby incurred loss, &c.

The resolution was then adopted.

ROLL OF UNITED STATES' OFFICERS.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to make a motion. He remarked, that at the first session of the seventh Congress, the President of the United States, for reasons by him set forth, transmitted to Congress a roll of the persons having office or employment under the United States. At that day, reform, economy, retrenchment, husbanding the public resources, jealousy of great military and naval establishments, jealousy of Executive patronage, jealousy of the power of the General Government, when in collision with that of the States—these were then the leading and prominent features of Republican faith. We find the President of the United States of that day himself pointing to the patronage with which he is clothed, to its enormous amount, and soliciting its retrenchment. But, setting aside any motive the President of the United States might have had in making the communication, it may be admitted on all hands that it cannot be improper for this House to possess such information. Mr. R. therefore moved—

"That the President be requested to lay before the House a roll of persons having office or emoluments under the Government of the United States."

Mr. RHEA moved that the resolution lie on the table. Negatived, 49 to 44.

Mr. LITTLE could not conceive any object in view in requiring the names of military as well as civil officers, and thought a distinction should be made between them in the resolution, as indeed he apprehended the gentleman who moved it intended.

Mr. RHEA moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the words "so far as he believes consistent with the public good."

Mr. BLACKLEDGE made a motion going to supersede that of Mr. RHEA, that the further consideration of the motion be postponed to Wednesday next. He wished time to prepare an amendment, which should except from the general requisition the names of those persons in the employment of the United States, the disclosure of whose names, and perhaps employments, the existing state of war might render improper.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, he had no objection to the resolution being postponed or laid on the table, but for the difficulty which was interposed to doing any business in this House, but such as the majority of the House should previously, directly or tacitly, have arranged to be done. Mr. R. said, he had himself attended in his place with a wish to make this motion at least twenty times. According to the present manner of transacting business, Mr. R. said, a difficulty was interposed, not only to making a motion, but to calling up business on the table—it was a mode of doing business before unprecedented and unheard of, in this House, or in any Parliamentary body on the face of the earth. This circumstance alone inducing Mr. R. to feel any reluctance to accede to the proposition for postponement. But while up, said Mr. R., permit me to notice a change, which would be amusing if it were not melancholy—a change by time and chance, which happen unto all things; a change in those who call themselves the legitimate successors of the seventh Congress; a difference between the feelings of this House now and then. This House now feels a fastidious delicacy, a sort of instinctive terror, an inward shrinking and fainting in calling on the Executive for that information which the Executive at that time voluntarily tendered to us. As to the nature of the information requested, Mr. R. said, he had copied the words from the Message of the President to the seventh Congress, transmitting what he was pleased to call “a roll of persons having office and emolument under the United States.” Mr. R. here read the Message alluded to. He stated his apprehension that an agreement to the motion to postpone to Wednesday next would be equivalent to rejection. The mode of doing business, he repeated, was almost such as to seal the lips of every man who has not the honor to hold some prominent station in the standing or select committees of the House. In his apprehension this abuse ought to be remedied. The evil had increased, and was increasing. The floor of the House should be open as well to one side as the other of the House—

Mr. R. had proceeded thus far; when

Mr. SPEAKER said, he did not think the remarks of the gentleman, reflecting upon the House for the mode of transacting business, proper in themselves or relevant to the proposition to postpone the resolution until Wednesday. In point of fact, he would observe that there was no difference in the opportunity enjoyed by gentlemen on all sides of the House, of submitting their motions. If there were not greater extension of the time for receiving motions, it proceeded from the inability to make a House, in consequence of the non-attendance of some members, at the hour to which the House is adjourned.

Mr. RANDOLPH having resumed his seat,

Mr. RHEA said, he should vote for postponement, because there could be no ground for the call. If the gentleman had any object in view, and would call for information relative to it, he had no objection to affording it. But this resolution was too comprehensive, it had a beginning, but no end or object that he could discover.

Mr. LACOCK said, he had no objection to the resolution, but that it was too broad for the present circumstances of Government. The name was required of every person employed by it, no matter how necessary that their employments should be confidential. It left no discretion to withhold the name of any person, although engaged in military or other concerns requiring secrecy.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE rose to say, that he was by no means hostile to the object of the motion, further than it might be detrimental to the public service. He wished to postpone it to prepare an amendment. If he could not amend it satisfactorily, he would then vote for it as it stood.

The question on postponement was agreed to, 58 to 49.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for raising for one year an additional military force of twenty thousand men.

The question was stated on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading.

Mr. BRIGHAM.—Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration if passed into a law, will deeply affect my constituents and the public in general. It provides for prosecuting this war on a more extensive scale—it is a kind of second declaration of war. The objects of conquest are multiplied; the field of operation is enlarged; the Army must be increased with the addition of 20,000 regular troops; and enlistments encouraged by additional bounty and wages. Sir, this is the system of arrangement to prosecute the scheme of foreign invasion. One error frequently prepares the way for another; we are now unhappily involved in the calamities of war, and the question is, how we shall prosecute and support it.

Mr. B. said he had been uniformly, and in principle, opposed to this war, and of course, opposed to all the measures connected with it; that in his opinion, this war was both politically and morally wrong; that it was declared without suitable preparation, without necessity, without an army, without adequate resources, and without unanimity; it has been prosecuted without success; we have also gained nothing but loss, defeat, and disgrace; the people are alarmed at the loss of their peace, distressed with the fruits of the war, and have serious apprehensions of what may be the future measures of Congress on this subject.

Sir, continued Mr. B., this war is of an offensive character; it is a war of conquest, totally inconsistent with the spirit and genius of our Constitution, and, if prosecuted in the present divided state of the country, I fear it may be fatal to our most valuable institutions. Republics, sir, ought never to be engaged in a foreign, offensive war; they are calculated only for defensive war.

Sir, there is something unaccountable, that the disposition to prosecute this war should increase, as the causes of the war decrease, and the means and ability to carry it on lessen. The war which we now have on hand is predicated principally on the Orders in Council. The impressment of seamen, during the last session of Congress, was considered of minor importance and as a proper subject of negotiation between the two nations, and was so considered in the days of General Washington, in those of Mr. Jefferson, and why not now by Mr. Madison?

Sir, the Orders in Council which interfered with our neutral rights are revoked. The President, in his Message at the commencement of this session, declared the fact, and the war now rests solely on the subject of impressment. I do not believe that the prosecuting of this war will have a tendency to bring about an amicable and satisfactory adjustment on this subject, and at the end of the war, if it ever ceases, this question of impressment must be settled by treaty.

Sir, at this time, and under these circumstances, we are called on to augment our standing army to the number of 55,000 regular troops, to prosecute the war with vigor, and, as some say, for glory.

Sir, if this system of warfare is carried into effect, we shall unavoidably create an annual expense of forty millions of dollars; and where is your money to defray this expense? Why, you must take it from the pockets of our constituents, and from those who are opposed to this war; and if you fail of obtaining the necessary loans, you must stop payment; the nation will become bankrupt, and future generations will be loaded with an enormous debt.

Sir, can this be for the honor and interest of the American people; can it be for the satisfaction of our constituents; are they in love with this war? Are they prepared to barter away their property and their peace for the hazards and fatigue of a foreign war, which promises nothing but poverty and distress? It is impossible. Sir, it is said that we are now about to make one sublime military effort, which shall do honor to this nation; that with these troops we are to take, not only the Canadas, but Halifax and Nova Scotia, and for aught I know, East Florida, follow up the Tippecanoe expedition, and exterminate the Indians. Mr. B. said that he never had known the incipient cause nor by what authority General Harrison made his incursion into the wilderness, beyond where the United States had extinguished the Indian titles, and destroyed the Prophet's town, but said that he hoped the time would come when he should know the merits of that enterprise.

Mr. B. said, if the friends of this bill and of the war could accomplish their darling object, subdue and take possession of the Canadas, and all the other British provinces in North America, in his opinion it would be a great public misfortune—fatal to the civil liberties of the country, and change the character of our Government.

Sir, said Mr. B., with these impressions, I deprecate the taking of the Canadas, or the other British provinces, as I do the loss of liberty and the ruin of this country. This war cannot be perpetuated and prosecuted without violating the laws of humanity and justice, the laws of religion and morality—and these laws are to be respected as well by nations as by individuals; and we have not only reason to believe, but do believe, that the God of Armies, who superintends the concerns of men, will give success to our arms, or blast our enterprise, according to its moral character. If the Canadas are subdued and conquered, it must be done by force of arms; and what have the inhabitants of those provinces been guilty of, which warrant this Government in putting them to the sword?

Sir, they are now inoffensive, and quietly pursuing their own business; they are content under their own Administration; they are protected by their own Government, and are not panting for the liberties of this country, as was vainly supposed the last season, nor do they ask us to relieve them from the oppression of their own Government, which General Hull, in his tender mercy promised them, in his pompous proclamation, on the condition that they would revolt from their rightful Sovereign, and put themselves under his gracious protection; nor were they terrified by the threat of extermination, if found fighting in their own defence by the side of an Indian; nor were they to be seduced from their allegiance by promises which could not be performed. No, sir, nor do they ask any favor but that you cease from troubling. Sir, they will not submit, and they have told you, by their actual resistance, that they will defend themselves, their councils, their firesides, their wives, and their children, their rights and their property; and they are not to be subdued but at the price of blood. And where is your authority, where is your right to go home, invade, and break into a foreign territory, and there establish a slaughter-house for the brave sons of America; there spill your blood, and expend your treasure, destroy cities, and demolish houses, plunder the inhabitants, and waste the substance of the industrious and the innocent? Sir, there is no right but a Napoleon right, and that right is power, and not that which reason approves.

Sir, there is no man in Christendom who is so abandoned to moral sentiment, or to the feelings of humanity, as dare say that he delights in the sight of the agonies of death; why then will you fall on the unoffending, and put them to the sword, and what are we to gain by it? He said that he saw nothing to be obtained, but a negotiation with the British Government, on the subject of impressment. Sir, no man will say that this war is a vindictive war, or that we can subdue the Government of Great Britain; why then pursue it? The advocates of this bill say in reply, that the war is commenced, and we must prosecute it, or submit:—Submit to what? Sir, to my mind we shall submit to nothing by abandoning this war, and making open and direct overtures for an honorable peace, but to the dictates of sound policy, and the wish of our constituents. It has been observed, that we cannot give up this war consistently with the honor of the nation. Why, sir, the honor which we may acquire in future, by prosecuting this war, is uncertain, if we reason from analogy, and from the facts before us, that have grown out of the last six months war; we have nothing to hope for on the score of honor. And if we continue the war for the four years to come, in my opinion the nation will be as destitute of honor as of money. Sir, the honor of Administration consists in promoting the peace, the prosperity, and happiness of the people. We cannot progress in this war against the public sentiment; we must have the people with us; if they want war they will have it, and they must put their hands in their pockets and pay for it; and it is equally true, that if they are opposed to this war they will put it down.

Mr. B. said, that the war was becoming more and more unpopular in the Eastern States, especially in the State which he had the honor to represent; and they had, in their late elections come forth and declared it in a voice and language which cannot be misunderstood. And whether there will be a majority in the next Congress in favor of this war was uncertain—he hoped not.

Mr. B. said, he had heard gentlemen say, that if we were united, we could prosecute this war with effect, and take the Canadas; so he could say, that were we united, we should negotiate an honorable peace, and put an end to the horrors and perplexities of war;—but this was not the fact, we were not united; we were a divided people. Sir, said Mr. B. we differ in sentiment on the bill under consideration, and who is in fault? If I differ from you, it is because you differ from me, and if we are equally honest, I shall consider it your misfortune, and not your fault.

Mr. B. said, he could not unite with the friends of this bill in prosecuting the war, without violating his own understanding and sense of duty. The Government had already suffered greatly from discord and difference of opinion; the body politic had been groaning under the weight of disease, and for several years past had been in a high state of fermentation, and for the last twelve months had a nausea; but he said, if the dose of taxes which were prepared last session, had been promptly administered, in his opinion, the nation would have disgorged the morbid matter, and by this time have been restored to a confirmed state of political health.

Mr. B. closed by saying, that the hoped the people of the United States would learn wisdom by the evils which they had been made to suffer; and that this House would not aggravate their distress, nor increase their alarm, by the passing of this bill.

Mr. RIDGELY said, he claimed the patience of the House while he assigned the reasons that would influence him to vote against the bill now under consideration. He considered the force contemplated to be raised by the bill as unnecessary. The present Military Establishment of the United States consisted of various descriptions of troops; they were the regular army, the rangers, the volunteers, and the militia. The regular army was made up of the Peace Establishment, authorized by the acts of the 16th of March, 1802, and the 12th of April, 1808, containing about 10,000 men, including officers, and of the "additional military force," which was directed to be raised by the act of the 11th January, 1812; these different establishments were incorporated by an act passed on the 26th of June last; and the present regular army of the United States, as authorized by law, consisted of twenty-five regiments of infantry, three regiments of artillery, two of light dragoons, one of riflemen, and one of light artillery, containing in all about thirty-six thousand men, including company officers and privates; of these the President might have not exceeding fifteen thousand enlisted for eighteen months, and the residue enlisted for five years, unless sooner discharged. Of the rangers, there were seven companies by the acts of 27th January, and 1st July, 1812, and about four or five hundred men.

By the act of the 6th February last, the President was authorized to accept of any company or companies of volunteers, either of artillery, cavalry, or infantry, who might offer their services to the number of fifty thousand men; their commissioned officers were to be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States and Territories, to which they might respectively belong, and they could only, according to the fair construction of this act, be considered as militia, liable to be called on to do military duty at any time within two years after they were accepted by the President, and bound to continue in service one year after arriving at the place of rendezvous. By the law of the sixth of July last, the President was empowered to appoint and commission the officers of the volunteers who had or should offer their services, and to form them into battalions, squadrons, &c., and they were thus converted from militia into a species of regular force. By the act of the 10th of April last, the President was authorized to call on the several States and Territories for their respective proportions of a detachment of one hundred thousand militia; and the call has been made, I believe, on every State and Territory. The present military force, then, of the United States, as authorized by existing laws, consists of upward of one hundred and eighty-six thousand men, all of whom, when in service, are subject to the rules and articles of war. Of these, the militia can only be used in the prosecution of this war for defensive purposes; the regulars and the volunteers may be ordered to act offensively against the enemy. They may amount, as we have seen, to eighty-six thousand men; and if Canada be as weak and badly defended as gentlemen seem to suppose, and the Administration should persist in their determination to conquer it, they should, I think, be satisfied with such a force to obtain an object so easily attainable. But, sir, said Mr. R., our present Military Establishment is certainly sufficient for all purposes of defence; and I wish to see no land forces raised for any other purpose. I have no hesitation in declaring that I should lament to see Canada or any of the British provinces on this Continent in our possession, or forming a part of the American Republic. They will never be worth, to this nation, in any point of view, the blood and treasure that their acquisition will cost us. It has been said by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that there are now in Canada twelve thousand regular troops, and that the militia amount to six thousand. To anything that gentleman should say, as matter of fact within his own knowledge, I should give the most implicit credit. But his estimate of the militia of Canada must be too low. His sources of information on this point must have been incorrect. The population of Canada (and when I speak of Canada, I mean both Upper and Lower Canada) has been variously stated, from three to five hundred thousand souls; according to no account, I believe, can it be less than three hundred thousand; and, I presume, no gentleman on this floor will say that estimate is too high. Take, then, the population of Canada to be 300,000 souls; what number of militia should this population furnish? We will take the State of New Jersey as a guide for our calculation; according to the census of 1810, the population of that State is 245,255, and its militia, by the return for the same year, 43,740, and the militia bears about the same proportion to the population in the States, generally, as it does in this State. If, then, the militia of Jersey, with its population, amounts to near thirty-four thousand, we may, I think, without danger of contradiction, estimate the militia of Canada (with a larger population) at between thirty and forty thousand; to these add the twelve thousand regular troops, and, in all probability, before we can act offensively against them in the Spring, the number of these troops will be greatly increased, and they may have an efficient force of about fifty thousand men to oppose an invading army. It ought to be recollected also, that a generous people, contending in their own defence, are actuated by far different and more worthy motives than an army of soldiers can be who attempt their subjugation. The Canadians will contend for their homes, their wives, their children; for everything that can or that ought to be dear to the human heart. They will be excited in such a cause to the boldest deeds. Instead of traitors, we shall find them true to their country and themselves, and able and ready to exert all their energies in their own defence. If we conquer them, it must be by great exertions, and with immense loss. To subdue a people acting under the impulse of such considerations as will operate on them, will require a force at least double to that which they can oppose to us. But can any man imagine that, if we invade the British colonies, the war will be there? Will the pride of Britain, powerful as she is at sea, and ready at any moment to meet every emergency, permit her tamely to look on and see her provinces wrested from her, without exerting herself with all her energies for their security? Will she make no diversions in their favor? Will she suffer us to carry the war into her territories, and not retort upon us? Does an unprotected seacoast of two thousand miles afford her no opportunities of attacking us? Do our rich and flourishing cities, exposed without defence on the seaboard, to the cannon of her ships of war, furnish her with no objects worthy her attention? Will the city of New York, laid in ashes, atone for the invasion of Canada; or, will the acquisition of Canada compensate to us for the loss of New York? Sir, said Mr. R., ten Canadas, ten times told, would not be worth to this nation that single city.

But of what value would these provinces be to us, if they could be easily acquired? Shall we, by their conquest, obtain the objects for which this war is waged? Shall we thereby secure our commercial rights? Not at all, sir. On the other hand, if the British Government would offer them to us, it would be our true policy to refuse to accept them. It is known to everybody that the population of several of the Eastern States is now full, and that great numbers of their citizens are constantly emigrating. The direction this emigration takes, it is also well known, is South and West. This surplus of population of the Eastern States settles on the banks of the Ohio and Mississippi, and carries with it its Eastern habits, and, if you please, its Eastern prejudices. They become connected and united with the people of the South and West. This union and intercourse will tend to render as the brothers of one family the citizens of this extended Empire. The prejudices of the South against the North, and the North against the South, are weakened daily and will be destroyed. The course this emigration takes is just as it should be. The currents flow from the extremities into the centre of the country. The operation is most beneficial to the nation, and tends constantly to strengthen and cement the union of the States. But if the British provinces should be conquered and become incorporated into the Republic, the direction of the emigration from the Northern and Eastern States will be at once changed. It will take a North instead of a South course. It will go just where it ought not to go. The strength of the nation, already too much scattered, will be still more weakened by a further expansion of its territory and population. The Northern and Eastern States, at present possessing more than their proper proportion of wealth, population, and strength, and having different habits, pursuits, and interests, from the Middle and Southern States, will, by the addition of these provinces, and the settlement of their surplus of population in them, acquire a weight and influence that this Union cannot control. It will exist only at their pleasure, and, in a few years, the destruction of this Government and a separation of the States will be the inevitable consequence.

But it has been said that we must make Great Britain, or rather her Ministry, feel through her people; and it is supposed we shall obtain the objects for which the war was declared by conquering her colonies. It is true that Government may be made to feel through her people, but it is her people at home, and not those of her distant provinces, that can influence the measures of her Ministry. If we could carry the war into the island of Great Britain itself, we might, perhaps, in that way, operate on her councils. It is her merchants, and the people of the mother country, who form the strength of the nation, that have weight in the decisions of her Cabinet. But of what value to her are the provinces on this Continent? They add not to her strength or her resources. If she did not possess them, would she be less rich, less great, less powerful? Would she have fewer means of annoying our rights? I have heard it said they furnish harbors for her fleets; but, can it be supposed that the mistress of the ocean cannot find harbors for her fleets? Will she not be able to find, among all the American islands, shelter and protection for such ships as she may choose to send into the American seas, although she possessed not one harbor on this Continent? In fact, the loss of the British provinces to our enemy, will not lessen her resources, weaken her power, or diminish her greatness. Their conquest, besides the blood and treasure it will cost, will, to us, be worse than useless. Under these circumstances, I do not think it right or expedient that a force sufficient for the conquest of these colonies should be raised and kept up until that object is accomplished; nor do I think the people of the country would be willing to bear the burden of the expense of such an establishment, in addition to the expenses we must be at in defensive measures.

While Great Britain owns these provinces, although they are not worth much to her, her pride will not permit her easily to surrender them; it will make her anxious to preserve them; and knowing, as she must, that the United States have the physical power to take them, their contiguity to us will operate in our favor, and be a means of checking, in a degree, the outrages of the mother country toward this nation.

If, however, Canada and the British provinces must be conquered, and more men be necessary, the Army contemplated by this bill will be of little or no service in accomplishing that object. It proposes to raise twenty thousand men, to be enlisted for one year. The term is too short. If the whole number could be obtained, it would take some time to get them. The term of enlistment of one-half will, in all probability, expire before the other can be recruited. To make a soldier, too, requires time. He is not formed in a day. To render the raw recruit of service, will cost much of discipline and of training. By the time the soldier who is enlisted under this bill, if it should pass into a law, begins to know something of his duty, his term of enlistment will have expired, and, if he should re-enlist, he must be paid an additional bounty. The force contemplated can never be an efficient one for the purposes of war. It will only be a source of useless expenditure of the public money. This reason alone, if there were no others, would be sufficient to induce me to vote against the bill.

It will, perhaps, be said that the force to be raised by this bill is intended to take the place of the volunteers in the present Military Establishment; and that as the last section of this bill repeals the laws authorizing the acceptance of the volunteers these regiments should be furnished in their stead. But, it will be recollected that the volunteer acts have been in operation for some time. They have, as far as ever will be the case, effected the object for which they were enacted. All have volunteered that mean to do so, and all the force that ever can be raised under them, has, perhaps, been raised. This bill, it is true, repeals the volunteer act; but, although this be the case, it still contemplates retaining in service all those who have volunteered. What the number of these may be, I do not know. We have been told by a gentleman on this floor, (Mr. Fisk,) that, in the District of Maine alone, there is a corps of ten thousand men now organized. This, and all other corps who have volunteered, will be retained in the service of the United States, if this bill should pass, under the proviso in the last section, which is in these words:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to deprive the officers and men who may have entered the service as volunteers, under the said acts, of any rights, immunities, or privileges therein secured, or the United States of the service of such volunteers, agreeably to the provisions of the said acts."

In discussing the propriety of passing this bill, it may not be amiss to take into consideration the subject of the ways and means. By looking over the estimates of appropriations necessary for the year 1813, lately transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to this House, it will be seen that, for the present Military Establishment of the United States, not including the militia or the volunteers, there will be required the sum of upward of fourteen millions of dollars for the present year. This calculation is made in the closet, and upon the supposition that things will happen according to the estimate. But, when it is recollected that the expenses of military establishments and military movements are almost always far greater than the best calculator had foreseen, and that there are daily objects of expenditure arising that have not been contemplated, we may fairly add a third, at any rate a fourth, to this estimate. This will make the expenditure for the year 1813 about eighteen millions of dollars for the present military land force of the United States alone, not including the expenses of the militia or the volunteers. The pay, subsistence, and forage of the twenty regiments, contemplated by this bill, will be, in proportion to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, for one year, $2,596,000. If we add the bounty, which will be $320,000, the expense of the twenty regiments may be $2,916,000, allowing nothing for waste and losses; and the expenses for the year 1812, on account of the land forces alone, not including militia or volunteers, upwards of twenty millions of dollars. It may therefore certainly not be improper, before we vote in favor of raising more troops, to ask that some plan for getting money to maintain and pay them, should be laid before us; that we should see the ways and means provided to meet our expenses; for I do not consider that the Republic is yet in such danger as that the whole energies of the nation must be called into action, at all hazards, to save the country. At present, no money is provided; no proposition is laid before us for providing it. It is not known to any man, so far as my knowledge extends, how the expenses of the present year are to be provided for and met. If taxes should be laid, they cannot be collected in time to meet the demands that will be made upon the public Treasury, and if we should resort to loans, it is not certain that by them the necessary supplies can be obtained.

But, as we are unfortunately in this war, it is not my wish that we should get out of it by making a dishonorable peace. A dishonorable peace would disgrace the nation as well as the Administration. If an honorable peace cannot be obtained, and we must prosecute the war, I for one have no hesitation in saying that it should be prosecuted on the ocean; I would abandon all ideas of conquest, or taking the provinces of the enemy. Let the United States be put in a complete state of defence; let them be protected at every point; let them be prepared to crush at once any invasion that may be made of their territory. Our attention should then be turned to creating a naval power that should be able to command the American seas; a force of this magnitude, it is perfectly in the power of this country to raise. An honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CHAYES,) who, during the last session of Congress, was chairman of the Naval Committee, in a most able and eloquent argument, which all must remember, proved that the cost of building twenty-five seventy-fours, and forty frigates, averaging thirty-eight guns, and supporting them for a year, would be upward of five millions and a half of dollars less than the expense of the military preparations that were authorized on the 17th day of January last for the year 1812. He also, I think, demonstrated that a navy of half this force would be sufficient to command the American seas, and to protect the commerce and maritime frontier of the United States, and that there could be no difficulty in procuring seamen. On land, every man we recruit is raw and ignorant of his duty. On board our ships of war every seaman, the moment he puts his foot on deck, knows exactly what he has to do, and will faithfully and fully perform his duties. He requires no training, no drilling. The habits of his life have qualified him to do the services that his country requires of him. If Great Britain were to discover in this nation a determination to create and foster a navy, it would have more effect on her than all the operations we can carry on against her provinces. She would not dread half so much the conquest of them all, as she would the naval greatness of this people, gradually expanding itself under a Government constantly encouraging, supporting, and protecting it. We fight, it is said, for commercial rights; let us, then, fight where we can, and where we only can, and ought to defend them. This will greatly tend to unite all parties. It must and will, if any efforts of ours can effect that object, command from the enemy an honorable peace—the wish and desire, I trust, of all.

Mr. PITKIN rose and said:—Before, Mr. Speaker, we give our sanction to this bill; before we agree to add so large a force to our present army, making the whole number fifty-five thousand men, is it not a duty we owe to ourselves and to our constituents, seriously to inquire into the policy, into the necessity of the measure, as well as into the present state of our relations with that nation against which we have declared war? Almost at the very instant when Congress declared war against Great Britain, the Orders in Council, and the blockade of May, 1806, the most prominent causes of the war, were removed. I have always, sir, considered the Orders in Council as the greatest obstacle to the restoration of harmony and free intercourse between the two countries. Had this obstacle been removed before the declaration of war, no one can believe that the Executive would have recommended, or that a majority in either House of Congress would have adopted a measure always fraught with evils in all governments, and which, in a Government like ours, ought never to be resorted to but in the last extremity. I cannot believe that the President, in that case, would have recommended it, when, on the 26th of July, 1811, through the Secretary of State, he informed the British Minister that, on the revocation of the Orders in Council, the non-importation law would be removed, and, of consequence, commercial intercourse would be restored between the two nations. It would be strange, indeed, if the President should, in one moment, restore a free intercourse between the two countries, and, in the next, recommend to Congress a declaration of war, solely on account of another topic remaining in dispute. And, in case such recommendation had been made, if any confidence is to be placed in the declared opinions of gentlemen, many who voted for the war would not, under such circumstances, have given it their support. Unfortunately for the country, the President did not embrace the opportunity, presented by the repeal of the Orders in Council, to remove the non-importation law, and thereby smooth the way for a complete restoration of harmony between Great Britain and the United States. Sir, this would have been done, and the remaining subject of dispute been left in the same situation as before the declaration of war, to be adjusted by amicable arrangements. But, sir, as this was not done, it remains for us, it remains for the people of the United States, to determine whether they will encounter all the evils, all the calamities of war; whether they will sacrifice the fairest prospects, and the best interests of this rising country, on the point now in dispute with Great Britain.

In the few remarks I shall submit to you, sir and to the House, it is not my intention to go into the consideration of all the original avowed causes of the war; but to confine myself to the new aspect of affairs, presented to us since the declaration of war by the removal of the Orders in Council and blockades.

On the subject of impressments, for which alone the war is now to be continued, what, let me ask, is the principle for which our Government contends? It is this, sir: that the flag of the merchant vessel shall cover all who sail under it; or, in other words, that our flag shall protect all the foreigners our merchants may think proper to employ in their service, whether naturalized or not. Before we raise immense armies, before we sacrifice any more of the lives of American citizens, let us inquire—

1st. Whether the principle, if yielded to us tomorrow, would benefit our native seamen, or would promote the real permanent interests of their country.

2. Whether there is a probability of obtaining a recognition of this principle by a continuance of the war.

The foreigners employed in our service are those who have not been naturalized, and those who have taken the benefit of our naturalization laws. The former constitute nearly the whole: the latter class is very inconsiderable. The foreigners of the first description, of course, were in competition with our native seamen, and either exclude them from employment, or lessen the rate of their wages. In this way, then, the employment of foreign seamen is an injury to our native seamen; and, in a national point of view, it may well be questioned, whether their employment subserves the permanent and solid interest of the country.

Is it not, sir, of the first importance to us, as a commercial and maritime nation, especially when it may be engaged in a war with a great naval Power, to be able to have a sufficient number of native seamen employed in our service? Seamen, who shall be attached by every tie to this country, and on whom we can depend for its defence in time of danger?

This, sir, it is presumed, cannot be denied. If so, is it not the dictate of wisdom and of sound policy for us to give encouragement to our native seamen in preference to those of any foreign country?

The situation in which we now are proves the correctness, as well as the importance, of the position. We are now at war with Great Britain. And, at the very time when this war was declared, thousands of British seamen who had not been naturalized in this country, were, and they still continue in our employment. These seamen (I am speaking, sir, of those not naturalized) are now claimed as British subjects, and indeed, by our own laws, are now considered as alien enemies. Will gentlemen suffer me to turn their attention to this last fact.

By a law passed the 6th of July, 1798, it is enacted, that "whenever there shall be a declared war between the United States and any foreign nation or Government, &c., all natives, citizens, denizens, or subjects, of the hostile nation or Government, being males of the age of fourteen years and upwards, who shall be within the United States, and not actually naturalized, shall be liable to be apprehended, restrained, secured, and removed, as alien enemies." Ought we, sir, to depend upon these men to man our fleets, or to defend our ports and harbors? So far as foreigners of this description are concerned, I do not hesitate to say, that it is not for the interest of this country that our flag should protect them, and that I will never consent to continue this war for the maintenance of this principle on their account. It is well known, sir, that not only Great Britain, but that France, and all the nations of Europe, claim a right to the services of all their subjects in time of war. In the exercise of this right, the history of Europe shows that, at the commencement of almost all wars, proclamations have been issued by the belligerent Powers, recalling their subjects to aid in the defence of their respective countries. During the present war in Europe, this has been done by Great Britain, by France, and the other belligerent Powers. With respect to this claim of allegiance, it is not my intention to enter into the discussion, whether, in the abstract, it is well or ill founded. This would lead me too far, and would tend to no practical good. I will, however, observe, that it is a right, a claim, which has been long exercised in Europe, and has been sanctioned and acknowledged by the most able and distinguished European writers on public law.

In this country we have hitherto considered the subject, rather as a matter of speculation, than of practice, and a diversity of sentiment has prevailed. But the new state of things, in which the war has placed us, must necessarily lead us to consider it in a practical point of view. Many Americans are now within the dominions of Great Britain, having removed there either before or since the war, and have not been naturalized. It is of importance to them, as well as to ourselves, to know in what point of light they are now to be considered, and how they are to be treated by us. Whether they are still to be considered as American citizens, and owing allegiance to the United States, or as having lost that allegiance.

This subject, sir, has been lately brought in official form before the President of the United States for his decision, in the case of Elijah Clark, who, in August last, on our northern frontier, was, by a court martial, condemned to suffer death as spy. The execution of the sentence was suspended by General Hall, the commanding officer, until the decision of the Executive could be obtained.

The case, as stated by the court martial, was, that Elijah Clark did cross from Canada into the United States, and did linger about our camp as a spy, for the purpose of making a report of the state and condition of it to our enemies; they also state and find, that Clark was born in the State of New Jersey; that he continued to reside in the United States, as a citizen thereof, until about eighteen months prior to August, 1811, when he removed to Canada, and there married; that his wife and property were in Canada, within the dominion and allegiance of the King of Great Britain. The article of war under which he was condemned, says: "That in time of war, all persons not being citizens of, or owing allegiance to the United States, who shall be found lurking as spies in or about the fortifications and encampments of the United States, &c., shall suffer death," &c.

The sole question for the determination of the President was, whether Clark, under these circumstances, was a citizen of, or owed allegiance to the United States.

The President decided, that notwithstanding his removal to Canada, about eighteen months before the war; notwithstanding his marriage and residence there, and being employed by the British Government, he was a citizen of the United States, and was not liable to be tried as a spy. His decision is contained in an answer of the Secretary of War to General Hall, and is as follows:

"I have now the honor to inform you, that the said Clark, being considered a citizen of the United States, and not liable to be tried by a court martial as a spy, the President is pleased to admit, that unless he should be arraigned by the civil court, for treason, or a minor crime under a law of the State of New York, he must be discharged."

If, sir, under these circumstances, we ourselves claim that our native citizens do not lose their allegiance to this country, how can we resist a claim set up by a foreign Government with respect to their subjects or citizens, when under similar circumstances?

With respect to foreigners, who have been naturalized under our laws, the question is of a more distinct nature, and presents greater difficulties. We ought, undoubtedly, to fulfill all our obligations towards them. What these obligations are, and how far they extend, are questions about which a diversity of sentiment may prevail.—While they remain within our territories, and within our exclusive jurisdiction, they are shielded by the general principle, that all within our dominion and exclusive jurisdiction, are, of course, protected against all claims whatever, and never to be molested in any way without our consent. But, sir, when they go without our territories, and beyond our exclusive jurisdiction, and come within the sphere of the claim of their former Government, the opinion of the best writers on public law seems to be, that the obligation of the country, under whose laws they have been naturalized, does not extend to guaranty them against such claims, unless their allegiance was changed with the consent of their former Government. But, sir, whatever speculative opinions may be entertained on this subject, the number of naturalized seamen is so small, that few, if any, can be of opinion that we ought to have declared war, or that we ought to continue it on their account alone. The whole number of seamen naturalized from 1796 to 1810, as appears by the returns made to the Department of State, is 1,332. This includes those of all nations. What, proportion of these were British, or how many of them are now in our service, it is impossible to determine. I presume, however, the number of naturalized British seamen now in our employ does not exceed two or three hundred. Shall we, sir, continue the war for these men?

I am aware, sir, that with respect to impressment from our merchant vessels, abuses have happened, that although the right of taking American citizens is not claimed, the British commanders have not been scrupulous whether they took British subjects or American citizens. Sir, these abuses I never can, and I never will justify. I am satisfied, however, that they have been exaggerated.

But, sir, let me ask, if we have not really intended to protect foreign seamen under our flag, if we have not been guilty of gross negligence, to say the least of it, towards our native seamen? whether, by our laws, and the practice under them, we have afforded them all that protection and security to which they are entitled?

In 1796, Congress passed an act for the relief and protection of American seamen. By this act, the collectors of the several ports were directed, on application, to enter the names of seamen, being citizens of the United States, to grant them certificates, in a form given in the act. In this certificate, the collector is to describe the person of the applicant; also, to declare that, on proof produced to him agreeable to the act, the seaman is a citizen of the United States of America.

It is not a little singular that, although the proof of citizenship to be produced to the collector must be agreeable to the directions of the act, the act itself no where directs what that proof must be. Every collector, therefore, has, under this act, used his own discretion, or has pursued such directions as he may have received from the Government as to the kind of proof. What, sir, has been the practice under this law? Have those certificates, or protections, as they are commonly called, been confined to bona fide American citizens? No, sir; we cannot, we ought not, to shut our eyes against facts too notorious to be concealed or denied. Under this act, made expressly for the protection of American seamen, every foreign seaman, almost at the moment of setting his feet on our shores, has obtained a certificate from some collector, that he is a citizen of the United States; and, with this certificate in his pocket, although perhaps a deserter from his own Government, he enters a public or private vessel, as an American seaman. The mode of obtaining proof of citizenship is well understood. Among other modes, some of which are too disgraceful to be mentioned in this place, those foreign seamen will go before a magistrate, and, although hardly able to speak the English language intelligibly, will swear, for each other, that they were born within the United States, and are American citizens. On such proof, a proof of this sort, the collector issues his certificate.

It will be recollected, sir, that this subject was brought before this House during the last session, in a case from Philadelphia, when a certificate of this kind was obtained by the most flagrant and avowed act of perjury on the part of a foreigner who had just arrived in this country. It was found, on inquiry, that there was no law, either of Pennsylvania or of the United States, to punish the man for this act of false swearing. Not only have these protections been thus obtained by fraud and perjury, but they have also, long since, been an object of barter; they have been bought and sold, and transferred from one to another, not only in this country, but in foreign countries.

To show the extent of this traffic in seamen's protections, permit me to state some facts, of which I have no doubt, knowing the source from whence I have derived them. An American captain having a ship in Bristol, in England, without a crew, he applied to a man who kept a boarding-house for sailors, to procure a crew of American sailors in port; he showed him a great number of American protections, which he agreed to sell him for two guineas each, and with the aid of these to procure him a crew. By high wages, and by suiting these protections to the description of British sailors, he procured this captain his ship's crew; not only so, but when the ship was about to sail, and it was doubtful whether those who had engaged for the voyage would actually go on board, this man actually procured some of a press gang to take them as American sailors, who had deserted from their ship, and put them on board. When we ourselves place no confidence in these certificates, when we know that they are thus obtained by fraud and perjury, can we expect that foreign nations will give credit to them? Instead of being a shield and protection to the real American sailor, they have become a dangerous weapon of offence.

If, sir, it is not for the permanent interest of the United States to employ so many transient foreign seamen, we ought long since, not only to have refused these false protections, but to have passed laws for the encouragement of our native seamen, similar to those which have been adopted in commercial countries, and are commonly called navigation acts. This would, in some measure, have relieved us from the evils which we now experience, in consequence of the employment of so many foreign seamen.

By the existing laws of the United States, nothing more is necessary to entitle a merchant vessel, if registered, to the character of an American vessel, than that she be owned and commanded by a citizen of the United States. If the master of the vessel is a citizen of the United States, every other person on board, employed in navigating the same, may be a foreigner, owing no allegiance to this country. In this respect, it is believed, our laws present an anomalous case in the history of the commercial world. In most, if not all the commercial nations in Europe, not only the master, but one half of the mariners, at least, must be subjects or citizens of the country to which the merchant vessel belongs. By the famous ordinances of Louis XIV, which have been considered as an excellent code of maritime regulations, every French vessel must not only have the captain, but all the officers, and two-thirds of the sailors, Frenchmen, and actually resident in the realm. In 1716, the King of France, however, prohibited the employment of any foreigners on board of merchant vessels. Afterwards, in 1723, on the representations of the merchants, he permitted one-third of the crew to be foreigners, and not beyond, on the penalty of fifteen hundred livres, and of the confiscation of the ship and cargo. In September, 1793, in the time of the French Republic, a law was passed that no vessel should be entitled to the privileges of a French vessel, unless the officers and three-quarters of the crew were Frenchmen. By the general navigation acts of Great Britain, it is well known that three-quarters of the seamen must be British subjects, to give the national character to a merchant vessel in that country. The maritime principle of the north of Europe requires that one half of the crew, at least, shall be subjects or citizens of the country to which the vessel belongs, or which flag it bears. In the treaty of June, 1801, between Great Britain and Russia, and to which Sweden and Denmark afterwards acceded and became parties, it is established as an inviolable rule, "that any vessel whatever, in order to be considered as the property of the country, the flag of which it carries, must have on board the captain of the ship, and one half of the crew of the people of that country." The policy of these regulations, which have been adopted by the maritime nations of Europe, is obvious. It gives a more certain stamp of national character to the vessel; it encourages native seamen; it affords greater security to the property of the merchant; and, above all, it adds to the real strength of a country, by placing in its power a greater number of brave and hardy men, who, bound by the natural ties of allegiance to their country, can be called upon to defend its rights whenever attacked. Let me ask, sir, whether, since we have become a nation so commercial, and, as a maritime power, must necessarily come more and more into collision with the maritime nations of Europe, sound policy does not dictate the propriety, as well as the necessity, of our adopting similar regulations, with respect to the navigation of our merchant vessels. This would, in a great degree, remedy the evils of which we now complain.

Indeed, sir, I fear it will be difficult, if not impossible, for us to remedy these evils, unless, by the adoption of a permanent system of this kind, we cease to employ so many foreign seamen in our commercial service.

But, sir, whether the principle, that the flag shall protect all sailing under it, be for the permanent advantage of the United States or not, let us, in the second place, inquire as to the probability of obtaining a recognition of this principle by a continuance of the war.

The subject of impressments has engaged the attention of every Administration since the commencement of the war in Europe, in 1792. The greatest and the best man that ever presided over the affairs of this or any other country, attempted to make a settlement on this subject, but was unable to effect one which was deemed by him satisfactory; and yet he did not think proper to involve his country in a war on this account. Similar attempts were made during the Administration of Mr. Adams, but without success. The subject was again agitated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, and under the most favorable auspices, in 1806, when they concluded a treaty with Great Britain during the Fox administration. If the principle we contended for would ever have been relinquished to this country, it would have been yielded under an administration which has always been considered as the most friendly to the views and interests of the United States. But, sir, Lords Holland and Auckland informed our Commissioners, that such was the feeling, such the sensibility of the British nation on this point, that no Ministry would dare to relinquish it. They would engage for nothing more than that the right should be exercised with the utmost caution, and in a manner pointed out by them in their plan delivered to our Commissioners, of November 8, 1806.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney were then satisfied that no other terms could be procured, and that these were far preferable to a resort to war. Mr. Monroe, in his explanatory letter to the Government, of February 28, 1808, speaking of impressment, and of the consequences which, in all probability, would follow from a rejection of the terms then offered on the subject, makes use of this emphatic language:

"War, therefore, (says he,) seemed to be the inevitable consequence of such a state of things, and I was far from considering it an alternative which ought to be preferred to the arrangement which was offered to us. When I took into view the prosperous and happy condition of the United States compared with that of other nations, that, as a neutral Power, they were almost the exclusive carriers of the whole world, and that, in common, they flourished beyond example, notwithstanding the losses they had occasionally suffered, I was strong in the opinion, that those blessings ought not to be hazarded in such a question."

If, sir, these blessings, as Mr. Monroe so justly calls them—blessings which every individual, because they come home to every man's dwelling in the nation, felt—were not then to be hazarded on such a question, why, let me ask, are they now, for the same question, not only to be hazarded, but actually sacrificed?

But, Mr. Speaker, if we have so little prospect of gain, let us inquire more particularly what we have to lose by the continuance and prosecution of this war. Thousands of American citizens must inevitably fall a sacrifice in the contest; our vast and widely extended commerce must, in a great degree, be annihilated; our shipping destroyed; and our revenue reduced next to nothing. We must necessarily incur an accumulation of public debt, for the payment of which we must be burdened with taxes for perhaps half a century.

Before the commencement of the restrictive system—that is, in the years 1806 and 1807—the commerce of the United States was greater than that of any nation in the world, except Great Britain. The return of our exports in the last of these years exceeded one hundred and eight millions of dollars.

The exports of France, in her most prosperous days, never exceeded about seventy-one millions of dollars. The widely extended Empire of Russia, with a population estimated at twenty-five or thirty millions of people, in the year 1802, exported in value only to the amount of about forty-three millions of rubles, or about thirty-two millions of dollars. The value of all the exports from the Baltic, comprehending Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Prussia, the great grain country of Poland, and the Hanse Towns, in some of the most prosperous years, has not exceeded ninety millions of dollars. In the articles of wheat and flour, we have lately come in competition with those countries situated around the Baltic, which are considered as the granaries of Europe. In the years 1801 and 1802, the average quantity of wheat exported from all the ports in the Baltic, was eight millions of bushels. The United States exported, on an average, for the same years, (reducing the flour exported to bushels,) little short of six millions; and, in the year 1811, the quantity exported from the United States exceeded seven millions. During the years 1806 and 1807, our exports were about equal to all the exports of Great Britain in the years 1792 and 1793—the time when the present war in Europe commenced.

With respect to our shipping, the commercial tonnage of the United States now exceeds that of all the other nations in Europe put together, except Great Britain; it falls little short of the amount owned by that nation. The vast increase of our shipping, for twenty years past, has been without example. In the year 1790, our commercial tonnage was about four hundred and fifty thousand; it is now about three times that amount.

When we compare this increase of shipping in England, which is now, and for a long time has been, the greatest commercial nation in the world, we are struck with astonishment. In 1700, the whole commercial tonnage of England was about two hundred and seventy-four thousand; in 1750, it did not much exceed six hundred thousand, and in 1800 it amounted to only one million three hundred and thirty-seven thousand—about equal to the amount now owned by the United States. As to our revenue in 1807, it exceeded seventeen millions of dollars; and the Secretary of the Treasury has informed us, that, with single duties, during the present war, it will not be more than two millions and a half. The war in Europe, terrible and destructive as it has been to that part of the world, has thrown wealth into our hands. Notwithstanding, sir, all the spoiliations upon our commerce—all the injuries we have received from the belligerents—history does not present an example of a nation which has increased so rapidly in wealth, in so short a period, as the United States. We have, indeed, become rich from the misfortunes and from the calamities of the Old World. If any one doubts this, let him look to our situation in 1807, before the restrictive system began, when our flag was in every sea, and we were indeed the carriers of the world; let him look to the vast increase of banking institutions in this country, having a capital at this moment of about sixty millions of dollars; let him look to the increase of wealth in all our large towns and cities, and to our internal improvements of every kind.

As to the debt which will be incurred in consequence of the war, as we are to depend solely upon loans, it must necessarily increase with great rapidity. The sum borrowed in the year 1812 was thirteen millions one hundred thousand two hundred dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury has informed us, that, to meet the expenses authorized at the date of his annual report, a further sum of twenty millions must be obtained on loan for the year 1813. This did not include the addition since made of four seventy-fours and six frigates to the Navy, for the building of which two millions five hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated; nor did it include the expense of the twenty thousand men to be raised by the bill now under consideration. Making every allowance—every deduction for the ranks of the various armies not being filled by enlistments—the sum which must be obtained on loan will be at least twenty-five millions of dollars; making the sum borrowed, in these two years, thirty-eight millions one hundred thousand two hundred dollars. What, sir, was the amount of the debt of the United States, exclusive of the State debts, at the close of the Revolutionary war? It was only estimated at forty-two millions three hundred and seventy-five dollars. If we proceed in the same ratio of expense as we have done in the prosecution of this war, by the 18th of June, 1814, (two years,) we shall have incurred a debt (provided we can borrow the money) equal in amount to the whole debt of the United States incurred by the seven years' Revolutionary war.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said those peaceful scenes of unexampled prosperity must be exchanged for war, on account of our honor. If we are to fight for this principle of honor, why not act uniformly? Has not our honor been always wounded by the other great belligerent? Has not Bonaparte taken hundreds of our seamen, and either immured them in his prisons or turned them adrift in France, without any means of subsistence; and have not we been obliged, within the last two or three years, to spend thousands and tens of thousands of dollars to enable these seamen to return to their native country? Has not he also robbed us of many millions of property, without any compensation, or even a promise of compensation? Why, sir, did he pass the famous Rambouillet decree, under which, with one sweep, he robbed our merchants of from ten to fifteen millions of dollars? This was done because, as he alleged, we had repealed the embargo, and passed a non-intercourse law against him, as well as against the other belligerent. And although our Government declared that the law was a mere municipal regulation, at which neither of the belligerents could or ought to take offence, the Emperor of France considered it as an act of hostility against him, therefore he passed this decree as a measure of retaliation. And when, sir, did he pass it? not until, by waiting about two months without any complaint, he had decoyed hundreds of our vessels into his ports, and then, by giving it a retrospective operation, he, without ceremony, placed the avails of these vessels and their cargoes in his own private chest.

What, sir, has been the conduct of the great Emperor towards this country in respect to the Berlin and Milan decrees? Has the honor of the United States no concern in this? Were these decrees in fact repealed? Did they cease to have effect on the 1st of November, 1810? No, sir, no man will now be bold enough to assert the fact. The Emperor has at length told you, that they were not then repealed. The deception which has been practised upon this Government is now too plain to be concealed or denied. It never was the intention of Bonaparte to repeal those decrees, until he was satisfied that we had taken, or would inevitably take, the last decisive step against his enemy; and his conduct has been in conformity with that intention.

He was not satisfied, sir, with our non-importation law—no, sir, he had long since declared, and we know it, he would compel us to be his allies or his enemies. When, sir, did the act repealing the Berlin and Milan decrees, first make its appearance? Not until the Emperor of France knew that we had passed the Rubicon; not until he knew (and I beg gentlemen will attend to the fact) that Congress had determined upon war with Great Britain, by laying an embargo for ninety days, as a sure and inevitable precursor to that event. Mr. Russell, sir, presented this decree to the British Government on the 20th day of May, 1812; he could easily have received it from Paris in the course of a few days. The embargo was laid about the first of April, there was ample time for the news to have reached France by about the 10th of May, and it was said at the time, that the moment it had passed both Houses of Congress, the French Minister sent off to France a fast sailing vessel, no doubt to give his master full information on the subject. On obtaining this information, the decree first made its appearance; and at a time too when, even if the Orders in Council should be repealed in consequence of it, the Emperor was satisfied that we should have gone too far to recede. The events have proved that he formed a correct judgment of the views and sentiments of our Government. The Orders in Council were repealed, and agreeably to his wishes, we are still at war with his enemy. We have not only been deceived by Bonaparte himself, but, sir, we can place no confidence upon the little information we sometimes obtain from our Minister at his Court.

What did Mr. Barlow write to some of his friends in this country in July last? Why, that he was upon the point of concluding one, two, or three treaties with the Emperor of France. What was the information he gave, at the same time, to other friends of his? directly the reverse: that there was no prospect of any treaty, or of obtaining justice from the French Emperor. Where is our Ambassador now? Gone to Wilna, to meet by special appointment, it seems, this robber of nations. What can be the object of this long journey, I know not. Perhaps, sir, to do homage to this mighty conqueror, perhaps to complete some of the treaties he has heretofore talked so much about.

The Emperor may, perhaps, now be willing to promise to do us justice, when the war against the common enemy is finished.

Mr. Speaker, during this war in Europe, the maxims of prudence, the maxims of sound policy, directed us to preserve the humble but successful path of neutrality—a path pointed out to us by the Father of his Country—a path, which has led to wealth, to prosperity, to happiness. We ought not to mingle in that storm which is desolating Europe. The fates, the fortunes of the new world, ought not to be linked with the fates, with the feelings and fortunes of the old. I have considered it as a sort of political madness for the United States to engage in, and in any manner to become parties in this mighty conflict. Those political—nay, those moral ties which, heretofore, have bound the great society of nations together, are now broken.

We may talk as long as we please about the law of nations; "it is a tale of other times." When such conquerors as Alexander, Cæsar, and Bonaparte, arise, their will alone always has been, and always will be, the law by which they are governed. And, sir, while the present state of the world remains, while Bonaparte lives, he who expects that we shall be able to restore and to replace the great landmarks of national law, will find that all his attempts will be vain, and worse than vain.

I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to have touched upon some other topics, particularly as to the mode of carrying on the war, and the propositions made to Great Britain by our Government, since the declaration of war. But, sir, the lateness of the hour admonishes me, that I ought no longer to trespass on the patience of the House.

TUESDAY, January 5.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill granting additional compensation to the Collector of the port and district of Plymouth, in the State of North Carolina; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A Message from the President of the United States was read, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be authorized and directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments the same annual compensation as is allowed by law to the Secretaries of State and of the Treasury; and that they be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. LACOCK was appointed of the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to our foreign relations, in the place of Mr. SMITH, deceased.

On motion of Mr. BACON,

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do cause to have re-printed the usual number of copies of the Message of the President of the United States, transmitting copies and extracts of documents in the archives of the Department of State on the subject of British impressments from American vessels, communicated to the Senate on the 6th of July, 1812.

Mr. TALIAFERRO offered the following resolution, observing that the reason why the provision had heretofore been withheld from our laws, was the uncertainty of water conveyances, which uncertainty by the invention of steamboats, had, in a great measure, been done away:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Postmaster General to contract with the proprietors of steamboats for the transportation of the mail of the United States by water; and also into the expediency of prohibiting the transportation of letters by water between post towns, or from one post town to another, by any packet or water craft, where the proprietor or master thereof shall not have previously contracted therewith with the Postmaster General, and report by bill or otherwise."

Some conversation took place on the motion. Messrs. RHEA, LEWIS, and SEYMOUR, objected to some parts of it. It was eventually, with the consent of Mr. TALIAFERRO, postponed to Monday next.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resumed the order of the day on the bill for raising an additional military force of 20,000 men for one year, the question being on the passage of the bill to a third reading.

Mr. BOYD.—Mr. Speaker: It is with great diffidence that I address the Chair. When the bill now before the House was under discussion on Saturday last; that is, the then proposed amendment to insert eighteen months, instead of one year, I was offering my reasons why I thought that that amendment ought to prevail; when, unfortunately for me, I was considered as taking too great a latitude, and prevented from connecting my remarks. As there is little difference, in point of principle, as the bill then was and now is, I embrace this opportunity to make up that deficiency, and will now take care to stick as close as possible to the text.

Sir, I am opposed to passing the bill to a third reading, because I believe it to be altogether inadequate to the purpose intended to be accomplished by it. Sir, when I last addressed the Chair, I then took a retrospective view of our past expectations, plans, and propositions, from which we expected to derive great advantages. Such were the expectations of that time, that I did not accord with them. Those expectations have not been realized; but, instead thereof, we have met with disappointments and misfortunes. I thought that viewing the errors of the past was the most certain way to avoid the future; and I am not at this time sensible of that being erroneous.

Mr. Speaker, I am an old man, and not in the habit of public speaking; and if I have not the faculty of composing my arguments in so connected a form as a lawyer's special pleadings, I hope the House will excuse me, and grant me their indulgence to do it in such form as my capacity will admit of.

[The SPEAKER observed that it was unpleasant to the Chair that the gentleman should indulge in such remarks; he had certainly no wish not to give full latitude to debate. Mr. B. said he stood corrected, and was allowed to proceed.]

Then, Mr. Speaker, I object, because, in my opinion, it is not calculated to produce the desired effect, or that which is intended by it: that is, to raise a force competent to the conquest of the Canadas in the given time. I will ask how many regiments you have in your present establishment? Say thirty-five, and you add twenty, making together fifty-five: what use is there in multiplying regiments without men? The Chairman did state that, from prudential motives, he had thought it inexpedient to give the number now actually in service, or enlisted by the present establishment. Sir, it is not my wish to go into a strict inquiry; the regard I have for the honor of my country forbids me; but I will suppose seventeen thousand, and, I believe, that is large; then there is left officers for eighteen thousand men. Are these not sufficient for the recruiting service? to engage every man who is willing to serve his country? to place a recruiting officer in almost every town and village in the United States? They are; and, therefore, you ought not to create an unnecessary addition. If the present establishment is not full, what is the reason? Either that the pay and bounty are not sufficient inducements, or there is a dislike to the service; your creating more regiments will not remove that difficulty. I am against the bill, because the term of service is too short to answer any valuable purpose. Suppose them intended to operate as a force against Canada. Let us see how that will answer the purpose: You send out your warrants to commence the enlistment of the proposed troops at this time; how long a time, is it contemplated, will be necessary for their enlistment? My opinion is, that you will not have them half full in four months; it is then time to take the field, and they are then raw troops. The honorable Chairman (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS) states to you the number of troops necessary for defensive operations, according to his calculation, to be ten thousand; deducting that number from the present establishment, supposing it to be full. It is not for me to say how far the present establishment is short of the whole number, or will be at that time; but we know that it is far short; we do not know that it can be filled, and if it cannot, then those calculations are fictitious. He also states to you that the regular force in the Canadas is not to be estimated at less than twelve thousand, and three thousand in Halifax, besides their militia. According to this, and my views, you cannot enter Canada the next campaign with man for man; and surely that is not sufficient for conquest in an enemy's country. But I will suppose that you conquer a part of the country; that part must be garrisoned if you will keep it. In a year from the time of enlistment their term expires, and what becomes of your conquest, without force to keep it, supposing it to be made? Say that the officers will be called into service in four months, and there is some of the men enlisted six or eight months hence; the officers must serve until the expiration of the term of the last man engaged, or a derangement must take place—always a disagreeable occurrence in an army.

Sir, if you have not numbers sufficient to bear down all opposition, invade it not; act on the defensive until you have engaged your men, and for a term of time sufficient to answer your purpose; then may you count upon success and honor. I do not say that I believe land conquests will produce an acknowledgment of our rights on the ocean. I believe it will not; but unless you act with great regularity, system, and economy, you cannot avoid it; you must meet with nothing but disappointments and disgrace.

Mr. LAW said as he was originally opposed to the war, and the preparatory steps which led to it, he could not admit the principle, that because war was declared he was bound to acquiesce, and lend his aid to promote every plan for prosecuting the war which might be proposed, however wild and extravagant the same might appear. He said he felt it a duty, and he claimed it as a right, (although he was not ambitious very often to exercise the right,) to offer objections to any measures which might be introduced, if he supposed they were not calculated to produce the effect intended, although he might not be in favor of the object itself; or if he believed the measure proposed would be productive of real evil. Now, sir, on this important occasion it would be wise for a moment to look back, and if we can bear the pain of retrospection, consider what this nation once was, what it might be, and what it in fact is. Time was, and that within the recollection of us all, when industry, commerce, prosperity, and peace, gladdened the hearts of this once happy people, and the use of arms was known only as a pacific pastime. The nation, like some individuals, could not bear the intoxicating influence of prosperity. It might have preserved its enviable condition, but it labored and groaned under the weight of national blessings; it submitted to regard the sinister views and malign influence of foreign Powers; it listened—fatally listened—to a serpent more fell than the serpent of old. And now how sad is the reverse, let a dejected and impoverished nation answer; in the past, we see departed comforts; before us, we behold ruin and distress. The unhappy crisis to which we have arrived has been progressive. Had the transition been sudden, the nation would have been driven to desperation. We have been often admonished by those who foresaw the present evils; and had we been wise, might have avoided the calamities in which the country is now involved, and from which there is at present no prospect of speedy relief.

Sir, we will no longer dwell on times past; we will now briefly notice the causes which were alleged in the manifestoes which immediately preceded the declaration of war, and what was said to be the object, and attempt to show that the bill now under consideration is unnecessary for the attainment of the original object; that it will be injurious to the militia, and may endanger the liberties of the country.

As to the causes of the war, without admitting or denying their justice on national principles to justify the act at the time it was declared, he might say that some of the pretended causes have never been seriously relied on by our own Government. The principal one has been wholly removed; and but one of the ingenious catalogue now remains, and that might easily be adjusted to the mutual satisfaction of both nations. And, sir, it ought not to be forgotten, that the act declaring war was carried with great labor and much reluctance; and such was the majority in each branch of Congress that it might well have justified a doubt as to the expediency when it did pass. Besides, a large proportion of the United States were then, and even since, have been opposed to the act. And this opposition was not confined to those who have been slanderously reported to be in the interest of Great Britain. The disgust and abhorrence was felt by some of the best patriots and purest bosoms in the country. Experience has also proved that the public sentiment was against the war; witness the feeble ranks of your volunteers, the slow and reluctant march of the militia, and the tardy progress in the recruiting service. Sir, the disgrace and disasters which have hitherto attended the Army, have resulted more from a want of confidence in the justice and propriety of the war, than from the lack of talents in those who have conducted the battles, incompetent as they have been represented to command. A nation like this cannot be driven to war. They must feel the justice and necessity of it, and the justice must be so strong as to pierce every heart. This would be felt in a necessary and defensive war; then, indeed, the nation would smite with one arm. Before such a people, roused in such a cause, the veteran legions of Napoleon would be compelled to bite the dust. Such, alas! is not our case. We have a war, without the spirit or unanimity which springs from these causes, and without the pecuniary means of supporting it. Such a war must be disastrous! On what, sir, is the honor of this nation now suspended? On the Navy! that little navy which was despised, neglected, and forgotten, until it fought itself into notice, and rescued the sinking honor of the country.

What, sir, was the avowed object of this war? It has ever been said that conquest, with a view of extending our territory, and enlarging our dominion, was not the wish of this Government. The idea of this Republic following the footsteps of foreign ambitious nations, was so repugnant to the genius of the American people, and the Constitution under which we live, that few, if any, of the warmest advocates of the war dare avow it.

The pretence was to take, or rather to receive Canada; for it was vainly supposed the inhabitants of that province would readily join our standard, on the first invitation. But we must go through the form of conquest to protect them from the charge of treason to their own Government. We were to hold Canada until peace should return, and then it was to be delivered up in exchange for maritime rights. And this it was supposed would be a powerful weapon in our hands in the negotiation. With this view the bills augmenting the Army, raising the volunteers, and transferring the militia, passed. By the present bill, and the project connected with it, the original plan is abandoned with the volunteers and militia, and we are now presented with a compound system of conquest, extermination, and defence. It would seem with the force of fifty-five thousand regular troops, we are to conquer all the residue of North America; exterminate every tawny infidel this side the Isthmus of Darien, and defend a seacoast many hundred miles in extent from the incursions of the enemy! This is truly a gigantic project. He said he could not give it his aid; and he thought some honorable gentlemen who voted for the war would, when they reflected on the magnitude of the scheme now presented, seize this occasion to retire, unwilling to entail on themselves and posterity the expense and ruin which would flow from the project, if carried into execution.

Sir, the bill is objectionable, on the ground that it is inadequate to the objects intended, even if they were wise and desirable. It is doubtful whether the men could be recruited; judging from the success which has attended the enlistments in the old Army they could not be. But supposing they could be raised with all reasonable speed, the time of service for which they are to be raised by the terms of the bill, was such, that it had been clearly shown, they could not be disciplined and rendered fit for the duty contemplated before their term of service would expire. In which case, they will be useless for the objects intended, and we incur the expense for nothing. He said he mentioned this as an objection to the bill, not that it was such in his mind, for he thought the difficulty of carrying it into effect was the only thing valuable in the bill. If, however, the bill and project should succeed, he said it would, in his opinion, be injurious to the militia. We have been told on former occasions that the militia constitute an important force, they have been styled the defence of the country. That the nation may and ought principally to depend on them, as from them security may be expected and no danger need be apprehended. This is doubtless true, and would prove so in a just and defensive war. But it is said we cannot order them out of the United States; true—and why, if the nation is principally to depend on them? Because, sir, it never was intended, by the framers of our Government, that we should become a conquering nation; and to check this ambition, this guard was put on that force, for it could not be presumed this nation would ever consent to raise a large army to be employed in foreign conquest. And for all Constitutional emergencies, the militia might be relied on; and we ought to be cautious, not to create a standing army, able to control and overcome the militia of the country. By passing the bill and raising fifty-five thousand men, we virtually say to the militia, you are useless, you are no longer to be trusted—they are despised, degraded, and neglected; they are no longer to be regarded as the national strength; we say we will have a regular army, sufficient, not only for conquest, but to suppress insurrection and enforce the laws. The militia being thus overawed and controlled by regular troops, will dwindle into insignificance, unless, from a principle of self-defence, they should be roused into action. But, sir, the bill is objectionable on another ground, perhaps more serious and solid; we are about to increase the Army to fifty-five thousand men. Is it safe to raise so large an army in this country? May there not be even more difficulty in disbanding them than there is in raising them? The whole world appears at this moment to be actuated by a military mania; all civil Governments, except our own, seem to be prostrated, and Europe is now groaning under martial law. Military power naturally generates ambition; it is the pabulum on which it thrives—it is the element in which it lives; a large army raised at first for defence naturally sighs for conquest. Have we any security against these effects? We have no WASHINGTON, who by his native majesty could control an army, and restrain their ardor to patriotic pursuits. But, sir, should a military chieftain rise up in these turbulent times, of less virtue and more selfishness than that immortal patriot, and be prompted to use this Army for purposes not now contemplated; and should this host find themselves disappointed in their pay, an event by no means impossible from the present aspect of affairs, may we not, when it is too late, find ourselves conquered, instead of Canada? Under the apprehension of these possible dangers, he said he must withhold his assent to the bill, and trust to his constituents to justify his conduct. If he really believed the bill necessary for the safety and welfare of the country, he would give it his warmest support.

Sir, it has been suggested that certain steps were about to be taken, to bring on a peace. He said he would with great pleasure join in that object. But it is intimated that it will be necessary to pursue the project connected with the bill, in the event those propositions should fail. His answer to this was, first: If the propositions were such as they ought to be, they could not fail, and the Army would be unnecessary: secondly, he doubted whether this was the best mode to induce the acceptance of pacific propositions. It seems to imply insincerity on the face of it. It looks as if we ourselves did not believe they would be accepted; nor was it the most conciliatory attitude for pacific negotiation.

Sir, said he, it will be recollected, when the proposition for this national tournament first came out, it was stated by a distinguished gentleman, among other reasons, why this nation should go to war, that it was necessary to establish its character, and convince other nations that we were a valiant and courageous people. It was said, they would respect us, and be more cautious how they provoked our ire. There was something novel and ingenious in the idea; but he confessed it had little weight with him, as a reason for the war. He believed the evidence of national valor was already engraved on the tombs of departed heroes, and recorded in the history of the country. Another idea had been suggested, which if not of less weight as a reason was at least more sublime. He said he meant the idea of fighting for glory. He could not, he said, consent to involve the country in carnage, distress and ruin, for that phantom. But he thought even on this point we might be satisfied. It is said by a poet of some celebrity—

"Th' extremes of glory and of shame,
"Like East and West, become the same."

We have arrived at the acme of true glory on the water, and he would leave the House to judge how far we were removed from the other extreme on land. He concluded by saying, he was against the bill—he was for peace.

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker, I fear that the state of my health may prevent my doing justice to my sentiments concerning this bill. I will, however, make the attempt though I should fail in it.

The bill proposes that 20,000 men should be added to the existing Military Establishment. This, at present, consists of 35,000 men. So that the effect of this bill is to place, at the disposal of the Executive, an army of 55,000. It is not pretended that this addition is wanted either for defence or for the relief of the Indian frontier. On the contrary, it is expressly acknowledged that the present establishment is sufficient for both of those objects. But the purpose for which these 20,000 men are demanded is, the invasion of Canada. This is unequivocally avowed by the Chairman of the Committee of Military Affairs, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) the organ, as is admitted, of the will and the wishes of the American Cabinet.

The bill, therefore, brings, necessarily, into deliberation, the conquest of Canada, either as an object, in itself desirable, or consequentially advantageous, by its effect, in producing an early and honorable peace.

Before I enter upon the discussion of those topics, which naturally arise from this state of the subject, I will ask your indulgence, for one moment, while I make a few remarks upon this intention of the American Cabinet thus unequivocally avowed. I am induced to this from the knowledge, which I have, that this design is not deemed to be serious by some men of both political parties; as well within this House as out of it. I know that some of the friends of the present Administration do consider the proposition as a mere feint, made for the purpose of putting a good face upon things, and of strengthening the hope of a successful negotiation, by exciting the apprehensions of the British Cabinet for the fate of their colonies. I know, also, that some of those who are opposed in political sentiment to the men who are now at the head of affairs, laugh at these schemes of invasion; and deem them hardly worth controversy, on account of their opinion of the imbecility of the American Cabinet, and the embarrassment of its resources.

I am anxious that no doubt should exist upon this subject either in the House or in the nation. Whoever considers the object of this bill to be any other than that which has been avowed, is mistaken. Whoever believes this bill to be a means of peace, or anything else than an instrument of vigorous and long protracted war, is grievously deceived. And whoever acts under such mistake, or such deception, will have to lament one of the grossest, and perhaps, one of the most critical errors of his political life. I warn, therefore, my political opponents; those honest men, of whom I know there are some, who, paying only a general attention to the course of public affairs, submit the guidance of their opinions to the men who stand at the helm, not to vote for this bill under any belief that its object is to aid negotiation for peace. Let such gentlemen recur to their past experience on similar occasions. They will find that it has been always the case, whenever any obnoxious measure is about to be passed, that its passage is assisted by the aid of some such collateral suggestions. No sooner do the Cabinet perceive that any potion, which they intend to administer, is loathed by a considerable part of the majority, and that their apprehensions are alive lest it should have a scouring effect upon their popularity, than certain under-operators are set to work, whose business it is to amuse the minds, and beguile the attention of the patients while the dose is swallowing. The language always is: "Trust the Cabinet doctors. The medicine will not operate as you imagine, but quite another way." After this manner the fears of the men are allayed, and the purposes of the Administration are attained under suggestions very different from the true motives. Thus, the embargo, which has since been unequivocally acknowledged to have been intended to coerce Great Britain, was adopted, as the Executive asserted, "to save our essential resources." So, also, when the present war was declared against Great Britain, members of the House were known to state that they voted for it under the suggestion that it would not be a war of ten days; that it was known that Mr. Foster had instructions to make definitive arrangements, in his pocket; and that the United States had only to advance to the point of war, and the whole business would be settled. And now an army, which, in point of numbers, Cromwell might envy, greater than that with which Cæsar passed the Rubicon, is to be helped through a reluctant Congress, under the suggestion of its being only a parade force, to make negotiation successful; that it is the incipient state of a project for a grand pacification!

I warn also my political friends. These gentlemen are apt to place great reliance on their own intelligence and sagacity. Some of these will tell you that the invasion of Canada is impossible. They ask where are the men—where is the money to be obtained? And they talk very wisely concerning common sense and common prudence, and will show, with much learning, how this attempt is an offence against both the one and the other. But, sir, it has been my lot to be an observer of the character and conduct of the men now in power for these eight years past. And I state, without hesitation, that no scheme ever was, or ever will be, rejected by them, merely on account of its running counter to the ordinary dictates of common sense and common prudence. On the contrary, on that very account, I believe it more likely to be both suggested and adopted by them. And, what may appear a paradox, for that very reason, the chance is rather increased that it will be successful.

I could illustrate this position twenty ways. I shall content myself with remarking only upon two instances, and those recent; the present war, and the late invasion of Canada. When war against Great Britain was proposed at the last session, there were thousands in these United States, and I confess to you I was myself among the number, who believed not one word of the matter. I put my trust in the old fashioned notions of common sense, and common prudence. That a people, which had been more than twenty years at peace, should enter upon hostilities against a people which had been twenty years at war; that a nation, whose army and navy were little more than nominal, should engage in a war with a nation possessing one of the best appointed armies and the most powerful marine on the globe; that a country, to which neutrality had been a perpetual harvest, should throw that great blessing away for a controversy in which nothing was to be gained, and everything valuable put in jeopardy; from these, and innumerable like considerations, the idea seemed so absurd that I never once entertained it as possible. And now, after war has been declared, the whole affair seems so extraordinary and so utterly irreconcilable to any previous suggestions of wisdom and duty, that I know not what to make of it or how to believe it. Even at this moment my mind is very much in the state of certain Pennsylvania Germans, of whom I have heard it asserted that they are taught to believe, by their political leaders, and do at this moment consider the allegation, that war is at present existing between the United States and Great Britain, to be a "federal falsehood."

It was just so with respect to the invasion of Canada. I heard of it last June. I laughed at the idea, as did multitudes of others, as an attempt too absurd for serious examination. I was in this case again beset by common sense and common prudence. That the United States should precipitate itself upon the unoffending people of that neighboring colony, unmindful of all previously subsisting amities, because the parent State, three thousand miles distant, had violated some of our commercial rights; that we should march inland, to defend our ships and seamen; that with raw troops, hastily collected, miserably appointed, and destitute of discipline, we should invade a country defended by veteran forces, at least equal, in point of numbers, to the invading army; that bounty should be offered and proclamations issued, inviting the subjects of a foreign Power to treason and rebellion, under the influences of a quarter of the country upon which a retort of the same nature was so obvious, so easy, and, in its consequences, so awful; in every aspect, the design seemed so fraught with danger and disgrace, that it appeared absolutely impossible that it should be seriously entertained. Those, however, who reasoned after this manner were, as the event proved, mistaken. The war was declared, Canada was invaded. We were in haste to plunge into these great difficulties, and we have now reason, as well as leisure enough, for regret and repentance.

The great mistake of all those, who reasoned concerning the war and the invasion of Canada, and concluded that it was impossible that either should be seriously intended, resulted from this, that they never took into consideration the connexion of both those events with the great election for the Chief Magistracy which was then pending. It never was sufficiently considered by them, that plunging into war with Great Britain was among the conditions on which the support for the Presidency was made dependent. They did not understand, that an invasion of Canada was to be in truth only a mode of carrying on an electioneering campaign. But since events have explained political purposes, there is no difficulty in seeing the connexions between projects and interests. It is now apparent to the most molested how a nation may be disgraced, and yet a Cabinet attain its desired honors. All is clear. A country may be ruined, in making an Administration happy.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that such strange schemes, apparently irreconcilable to common sense and common prudence, were, on that very account, more likely to be successful. Sir, there is an audacity, which sometimes stands men instead both of genius and strength. And most assuredly, he is most likely to per form that which no man ever did before, and will never be likely to do again, who has the boldness to undertake that, which no man ever thought of attempting, in time past, and no man will ever think of attempting in time future. I would not, however, be understood as intimating, that this Cabinet project of invasion is impracticable, either as it respects the collection of means and instruments, or in the ultimate result. On the contrary, sir, I deem both very feasible. Men may be obtained. For if forty dollars bounty cannot obtain them, an hundred dollars bounty may, and the intention is explicitly avowed not to suffer the attainment of the desired army to be prevented by any vulgar notions of economy. Money may be obtained. What, by means of the increased popularity, derived from the augmentation of the navy, what, by opening subscription offices in the interior of the country, what, by large premiums, the cupidity of the moneyed interest may be tempted beyond the point of patriotic resistance, and all the attained means being diverted to the use of the army, pecuniary resources may be obtained, ample at least for the first year. And, sir, let an army of thirty thousand men be collected, let them be put under the command of a popular leader, let them be officered to suit his purposes, let them be flushed with victories, and see the fascinating career of military glory opening upon them, and they will not thereafter ever be deficient in resources. If they cannot obtain their pay by your votes, they will collect it by their own bayonets; and they will not rigidly observe any air-lines or water-lines in enforcing their necessary levies; nor be stayed by abstract speculations concerning right, or learned Constitutional difficulties.

I desire therefore, that it may be distinctly understood, both by this House and this nation, that it is my unequivocal belief that the invasion of Canada, which is avowed by the Cabinet to be its purpose, is intended by it; that continuance of the war and not peace is its project. Yes, sir, as the French Emperor said concerning ships and colonies, so our Cabinet, the friends of the French Emperor, may say, with respect to Canada and Halifax—"They enter into the scope of its policy."

[Mr. QUINCY was here called to order by Mr. HALL, of Georgia, for intimating that the members of the Cabinet were friends to the French Emperor.]

Mr. QUINCY said, that he understood that the relations of amity did subsist between this country and France, and that in such a state of things, he had a right to speak of the American Cabinet as friends of France, in the same manner as he had now a right to call them the enemies of Great Britain.

The SPEAKER said, that the relations of amity certainly did subsist between this country and France, and that he did not conceive the gentleman from Massachusetts to be out of order in his expressions. That it was impossible to prevent gentlemen from expressing themselves so as to convey an inuendo.]

Mr. QUINCY proceeded.—If, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia and his political friends would take one thing into consideration, he and they will have no reason to complain, in case the Cabinet be of that immaculate nature he supposes. No Administration, no man, was ever materially injured by any mere "inuendo." The strength of satire is the justness of the remark, and the only sting of invective is the truth of the observation.

I will now proceed to discuss those topics which naturally arise out of the bill under consideration, and examine the proposed invasion of Canada, at three different points of view.

1. As a means of carrying on the subsisting war.
2. As a means of obtaining an early and honorable peace.
3. As a means of advancing the personal and local projects of ambition of the members of the American Cabinet.

Concerning the invasion of Canada, as a means of carrying on the subsisting war, it is my duty to speak plainly and decidedly, not only because I herein express my own opinions upon the subject, but, as I conscientiously believe, the sentiments also of a very great majority of that whole section of country in which I have the happiness to reside. I say then, sir, that I consider the invasion of Canada as a means of carrying on this war, as cruel, wanton, senseless, and wicked.

You will easily understand, Mr. Speaker, by this very statement of opinion, that I am not one of that class of politicians which has for so many years predominated in the world, on both sides of the Atlantic. You will readily believe, that I am not one of those who worship in that temple, where Condorcet is the High Priest and Machiavel the God. With such politicians the end always sanctifies the means; the least possible good to themselves perfectly justifies, according to their creed, the inflicting the greatest possible evil upon others. In the judgment of such men, if a corrupt Ministry at three thousand miles distance shall have done them an injury, it is an ample cause to visit with desolation a peaceable and unoffending race of men, their neighbors, who happen to be associated with that Ministry by ties of mere political dependence. What though these colonies be so remote from the sphere of the questions in controversy, that their ruin or prosperity could have no possible influence upon the result? What though their cities offer no plunder? What though their conquest can yield no glory? In their ruin there is revenge. And revenge to such politicians is the sweetest of all morsels. With such men, neither I nor the people of that section of country in which I reside hold any communion. There is between us and them no one principle of sympathy either in motive or action.

That wise, moral, reflecting people, which constitute the great mass of the population of Massachusetts—indeed, of all New England—look for the sources of their political duties nowhere else than in those fountains from which spring their moral duties. According to their estimate of human life and its obligations, both political and moral duties emanate from the nature of things, and from the essential and eternal relations which subsist among them. True it is, that a state of war gives the right to seize and appropriate the property and territories of an enemy. True it is, that the colonies of a foreign Power are viewed, according to the law of nations, in the light of its property. But in estimating the propriety of carrying desolation into the peaceful abodes of their neighbors, the people of New England will not limit their contemplation to the mere circumstance of abstract right, nor ask what lawyers and jurists have written or said, as if this was conclusive upon the subject. That people are much addicted to think for themselves, and in canvassing the propriety of such an invasion, they will consider the actual condition of those colonies, their natural relations to us, and the effect which their conquest and ruin will have, not only upon the people of those colonies, but upon themselves, and their own liberties and Constitution. And above all, what I know will seem strange to some of those who hear me, they will not forget to apply to a case occurring between nations, as far as is practicable, that heaven-descended rule which the great author and founder of their religion has given them for the regulation of their conduct towards each other. They will consider it the duty of these United States to act towards those colonies as they would wish those colonies to act, in exchange of circumstances, towards these United States.

The actual condition of those colonies, and the relation in which they stood to the United States antecedent to the declaration of war, were of this nature. Those colonies had no connexion with the questions in dispute between us and their parent State. They had done us no injury. They meditated none to us. Between the inhabitants of those colonies and the citizens of the United States, the most friendly and mutually useful intercourse subsisted. The borderers on this, and those on the other side of the St. Lawrence, and of the boundary line, scarcely realized that they were subjects of different Governments. They interchanged expressions and acts of civility. Intermarriages took place among them. The Canadian sometimes settled in the United States; sometimes our citizens emigrated to Canada. After the declaration of war, had they any disposition to assail us? We have the reverse expressly in evidence. They desired nothing so much as to keep perfect the then subsisting relations of amity. Would the conquest of those colonies shake the policy of the British cabinet? No man has shown it. Unqualified assertions, it is true, have been made, but totally unsupported by any evidence, or even the pretence of argument. On the contrary, nothing was more obvious than that an invasion of Canada must strengthen the Ministry of Great Britain, by the excitement and sympathy which would be occasioned in the people of that country in consequence of the sufferings of the innocent inhabitants of those colonies, on account of a dispute in which they had no concern, and of which they had scarcely a knowledge. All this was anticipated—all this was frequently urged to this House, at the last and preceding sessions, as the necessary effect of such a measure. The event has justified those predictions. The late elections in Great Britain have terminated in the complete triumph of the friends of the British Ministry. In effecting this change, the conduct of the United States in relation to Canada has had, undeniably, a mighty influence, by the disgust and indignation felt by the British people at a step so apparently wanton and cruel.

As there was no direct advantage to be hoped from the conquest of Canada, so also, there was none incidental. Plunder there was none—at least, none which would pay the cost of the conquest. Glory there was none. Could seven millions of people obtain glory by precipitating themselves upon half a million, and trampling them into the dust? A giant obtain glory by crushing a pigmy! That giant must have a pigmy's spirit who could reap, or hope, glory from such an achievement.

Surely a people, with whom we were connected by so many natural and adventitious ties, had some claims upon our humanity. Surely if our duty required that they and theirs should be sacrificed to our interests or our passions, some regret mingled in the execution of our purpose. We postponed the decree of ruin until the last moment. We hesitated—we delayed until longer delay was dangerous. Alas! sir, there was nothing of this kind or character in the conduct of the Cabinet. The war had not yet been declared, when General Hull had his instructions to put in train the work of destruction. There was an eagerness for the blood of the Canadians—a headlong precipitation for their ruin, which indicated anything else rather than feelings of humanity, or visitings of nature, on account of their condition. Our armies were on their march for their frontier, while yet peace existed between this country and the parent State; and the invasion was obstinately pursued, after a knowledge that the chief ground of controversy was settled, by the abandonment of the British Orders in Council; and after nothing remained but a stale ground of dispute, which, however important in itself, was of a nature for which no man has ever yet pretended that for it alone war would have been declared. Did ever one Government exhibit towards any people a more bloody and relentless spirit of rancour? Tell me not of petty advantages—of remote, and, possibly, useful contingencies which might arise from the devastation of those Colonies. Show any advantage which justifies that dreadful vial of wrath which, if the intention of the American Cabinet had been fulfilled, would, at this day, have been poured out upon the heads of the Canadians. It is not owing to the tender mercies of the American Administration, if the bones of the Canadians are not at this hour mingled with the ashes of their habitations. It is easy enough to make an excuse for any purpose. When a victim is destined to be immolated, every hedge presents sticks for the sacrifice. The lamb who stands at the mouth of the stream, will always trouble the water, if you take the account of the wolf who stands at the source of it. But show a good to us bearing any proportion to the multiplied evils proposed to be visited upon them. There is none. Never was there an invasion of any country worse than this, in point of moral principle, since the invasion of the West Indies by the Buccaneers, or that of the United States by Captain Kidd. Indeed, both Kidd and the Buccaneers had more apology for their deed than the American Cabinet. They had at least the hope of plunder; but in this case there is not even the poor refuge of cupidity. We have heard great lamentations about the disgrace of our arms on the frontier. Why, sir, the disgrace of our arms on the frontier is terrestrial glory, in comparison with the disgrace of the attempt. The whole atmosphere rings with the utterance, from the other side of the House, of this word "glory"—"glory" in connexion with this invasion. What glory? Is it the glory of the tiger which lifts his jaws, all foul and bloody, from the bowels of his victim, and roars for his companions of the wood to come and witness his prowess and his spoils? Such is the glory of Genghis Khan, and of Bonaparte. Be such glory far, very far, from my country. Never, never may it be accursed with such fame.

"Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glittering foil
Set off to the world, nor in broad rumor lies,
But lives and spreads aloft, by those pure eyes,
And perfect witness of all-judging Jove,
As he pronounces lastly on each deed."

May such fame as this be my country's meed!

But the wise and thoughtful people of our Northern section will confine their reflections to the duties which result from the actual condition of those Colonies, and their general relations to the United States; they will weigh the duties the people of the United States owe to themselves, and contemplate the effect which the subjugation of those Canadians will have upon our own liberties and Constitution. Sir, it requires but little experience in the nature of the human character, and but a very limited acquaintance with the history of man, to be satisfied that with the conquest of the Canadas, the liberties and Constitution of this country perish.

Of all nations in the world, this nation is the last which ought to admit, among its purposes, the design of foreign conquests. States such as are these, connected by ties so peculiar; into whose combination there enters necessarily numerous jealousies and fears; whose interests are not always reconcilable; and the passions, education, and character of whose people, on many accounts, are repugnant to each other; with a Constitution made merely for defence; it is impossible that an association of independent Sovereignities, standing in such relations to each other, should not have the principles of its union, and the hopes of its Constitution, materially affected by the collection of a large military force, and its employment in the subjugation of neighboring territories. It is easy to see that an army collected in such a state of society as that which exists in this country, where wages are high and subsistence easily to be obtained, must be composed, so far as respects the soldiery, for the most part of the refuse of the country; and as respects the officers, with some honorable exceptions indeed, must consist, in a considerable degree, of men desperate sometimes in fortune, at others in reputation; "choice spirits;" men "tired of the dull pursuits of civil life," who have not virtue or talents to rise in a calm and settled state of things, and who, all other means of advancement or support wanting or failing, take to the sword. A body of thirty or fifty thousand such men, combined, armed, and under a popular leader, is a very formidable force. They want only discipline and service to make them veterans. Opportunity to acquire these, Canada will afford. The army which advances to the walls of Quebec, in the present condition of Canadian preparation, must be veteran. And a veteran army, under a popular leader, flushed with victory, each individual realizing, that while the body remains combined, he may be something, and possibly very great; that if dissolved, he sinks into insignificance; will not be disbanded by vote. They will consult with one another, and with their beloved chieftain, upon this subject; and not trouble themselves about the advice of the old people who are knitting and weaving in the chimney corners at Washington. Let the American people receive this as an undoubted truth, which experience will verify. Whoever plants the American standard on the walls of Quebec, conquers it for himself, and not for the people of the United States. Whoever lives to see that event—may my head be low in the dust before it happen!—will witness a dynasty established in that country by the sword. He will see a King or an Emperor, dukedoms and earldoms, and baronies, distributed to the officers, and knights' fees bestowed on the soldiery. Such an army will not trouble itself about geographical lines, in portioning out the divisions of its new empire; and will run the parallels of its power by other steel than that of the compass. When that event happens, the people of New England, if they mean to be free, must have a force equal to defend themselves against such an army. And a military force equal to this object will itself be able to enslave the country.

Mr. Speaker—When I contemplate the character and consequences of this invasion of Canada; when I reflect upon its criminality and its danger to the peace and liberty of this once happy country; I thank the great Author and Source of all virtue, that through His grace that section of country in which I have the happiness to reside, is, in so great a degree, free from the iniquity of this transgression. I speak it with pride, the people of that section have done what they could to vindicate themselves and their children from the burden of this sin. That whole section has risen, almost as one man, for the purpose of driving from power, by one great Constitutional effort, the guilty authors of this war. If they have failed, it has not been through the want of will or of exertion, but in consequence of the weakness of their political power. When in the usual course of Divine Providence, who punishes nations as well as individuals, His destroying angel shall on this account pass over this country—and sooner or later, pass it will—I may be permitted to hope that over New England his hand will be stayed. Our souls are not steeped in the blood which has been shed in this war. The spirits of the unhappy men who have been sent to an untimely audit, have borne to the bar of divine justice no accusations against us.

This opinion, concerning the principles of this invasion of Canada, is not peculiar to me. Multitudes who approve the war, detest it. I believe this sentiment is entertained, without distinction of parties, by almost all the moral sense, and nine-tenths of the intelligence, of the whole northern section of the United States. I know that men from that quarter of the country will tell you differently. Stories of a very different kind are brought by all those who come trooping to Washington for place, appointments, and emoluments; men who will say anything to please the ear, or do anything to please the eye of Majesty, for the sake of those fat contracts and gifts which it scatters; men whose fathers, brothers, and cousins, are provided for by the Departments; whose full-grown children are at suck at the money-distilling breasts of the Treasury; the little men who sigh after great offices; those who have judgeships in hand or judgeships in promise; toads that live upon the vapor of the palace that swallow great men's spittle at the levees; that stare and wonder at all the fine sights which they see there; and most of all wonder at themselves—how they got there to see them. These men will tell you, that New England applauds this invasion.

But, Mr. Speaker, look at the elections. What is the language they speak? The present tenant of the Chief Magistracy rejected, by that whole section of country, with the exception of a single State, unanimously. And for whom? In favor of a man, out of the circle of his own State, without much influence, and personally almost unknown. In favor of a man against whom the prevailing influence in New England had previously strong political prejudices; and with whom, at the time of giving him their support, they had no political understanding; in favor of a man whose merits, whatever in other respects they might be, were brought into notice, in the first instance, chiefly so far as that election was concerned, by their opinion of the utter want of merit of the man whose re-election they opposed.

Among the causes of that universal disgust which pervaded all New England, at the Administration and its supporters, was the general dislike and contempt of this invasion of Canada. I have taken some pains to learn the sentiments which prevail on this subject in New England, and particularly among its yeomanry, the pride and the hope of that country. I have conversed with men, resting on their spades and leaning on the handles of their ploughs, while they relaxed for a moment from the labor by which they support their families, and which gives such a hardihood and character to their virtues. They asked—"What do we want of Canada? We have land enough. Do we want plunder? There is not enough of that to pay the cost of getting it. Are our Ocean rights there? Or is it there our seamen are held in captivity? Are new States desired? We have plenty of those already. Are they to be held as conquered territories? This will require an army there. Then, to be safe, we must have an army here. And with a standing army, what security for our liberties?"

These are no fictitious reasonings. They are the suggestions I doubt not of thousands and tens of thousands of our hardy New England yeomanry; men who, when their country calls, at any wise and real exigency, will start from their native soils and throw their shields over their liberties, like the soldiers of Cadmus, "armed in complete steel;" yet men, who have heard the winding of your horn to the Canada campaign, with the same apathy and indifference with which they would hear in the streets the trilling of a jews-harp, or the twirling of a banjo.

The plain truth is, that the people of New England have no desire for Canada. Their moral sentiment does not justify, and they will not countenance its invasion. I have thus stated the grounds on which they deem, and I have felt myself bound to maintain, that this contemplated invasion of that territory is, as it respects the Canadians, wanton and cruel; because it inflicts the greatest imaginable evils on them, without any imaginable benefit to us; that, as it respects the United States, such an invasion is senseless, because, ultimately, ruinous to our own political safety; and wicked, because it is an abuse of the blessings of Divine Providence, and a manifest perversion of His multiplied bounties, to the purpose of desolating an innocent and unoffending people.

I shall now proceed to the next view I proposed to take on this project of invading Canada, and consider it in the light of a means to obtain an early and honorable peace. It is said, and this is the whole argument in favor of this invasion, in this aspect, that the only way to negotiate successfully with Great Britain, is to appeal to her fears and raise her terrors for the fate of her colonies. I shall here say nothing concerning the difficulties of executing this scheme; nor about the possibility of a deficiency both in men and money. I will not dwell on the disgust of all New England, nor on the influence of this disgust with respect to your efforts. I will admit, for the present, that an army may be raised, and that during the first years it may be supported by loans, and that afterwards it will support itself by bayonets. I will admit farther, for the sake of argument, that success is possible and that Great Britain realizes the practicability of it. Now, all this being admitted, I maintain that the surest of all possible ways to defeat any hope from negotiation, is the threat of such an invasion, and an active preparation to execute it. Those must be very young politicians, their pin-feathers not yet grown, and however they may flutter on this floor, they are not yet fledged for any high or distant flight, who think that threats and appealing to fear are the ways of producing a disposition to negotiate in Great Britain, or in any other nation which understands what it owes to its own safety and honor. No nation can yield to threat, what it might yield to a sense of interest; because, in that case, it has no credit for what it grants, and what is more, loses something in point of reputation, from the imbecility which concessions made under such circumstances indicate. Of all nations in the world, Great Britain is the last to yield to considerations of fear and terror. The whole history of the British nation is one tissue of facts, tending to show the spirit with which she meets all attempts to bully and brow-beat her into measures inconsistent with her interests or her policy. No nation ever before made such sacrifices of the present to the future. No nation ever built her greatness more systematically, on the principles of a haughty self-respect, which yields nothing to suggestions of danger, and which never permits either her ability or inclination to maintain her rights to be suspected. In all negotiations, therefore, with that Power, it may be taken as a certain truth, that your chance of failure is just in proportion to the publicity and obtrusiveness of threats and appeals to fear.

The American Cabinet understands all this very well, although this House may not. Their policy is founded upon it. The project of this bill is to put at a still further distance the chance of amicable arrangement, in consequence of the dispositions which the threat of invasion of their colonies, and attempt to execute it, will excite in the British nation and Ministry. I have some claim to speak concerning the policy of the men who constitute the American Cabinet. For eight years I have studied their history, characters, and interests. I know no reason why I should judge them severely, except such as arise from those inevitable conclusions, which avowed principles and distinct conduct have impressed upon the mind. I say, then, sir, without hesitation, that in my judgment, the embarrassments of our relations with Great Britain, and keeping alive between this country and that a root of bitterness, has been, is, and will continue to be, a main principle of the policy of this American Cabinet. They want not a solid settlement of our differences. If the nation will support them in it, they will persevere in the present war. If it will not, some general arrangements will be the resort, which will leave open opportunities for discord; which on proper occasions will be improved by them. I shall give my reasons for this opinion. I wish no sentiments of mine to have influence any farther than the reasons upon which they are founded justify. They are public reasons, arising from undeniable facts; the nation will judge for itself.

The men who now, and who, for these twelve years past, have, to the misfortune of this country, guided its councils and directed its destinies, came into power on a tide, which was raised and supported by elements constituted of British prejudices and British antipathies. The parties which grew up in this nation took their origin and form at the time of the adoption of the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay, in 1794. The opposition of that day, of which the men now in power were the leaders, availed themselves, very dexterously, of the relics of that hatred towards the British name which remained after the Revolutionary war. By perpetually blowing up the embers of the ancient passions, they excited a flame in the nation; and by systematically directing it against the honorable men who at that time conducted its affairs, the strength and influence of those men were impaired. The embarrassments with France, which succeeded, in 1798 and 1799, were turned to the same account. Unfortunately, those who then conducted the public affairs attended less to the appearance of things, than to their measures; and considered more what was due to their country than was prudent, in the state of the prejudices and jealousies of the people, thus artfully excited against them. They went on, in the course they deemed right, regardless of personal consequences, and blind to the evidences of discontent which surrounded them. The consequences are well known. The supreme power in these United States passed into the hands which now possess it; in which it has been continued down to the present time. The transfer of power was effected, undeniably, principally on the very ground of those prejudices and antipathies which existed in the nation against Great Britain; and which had been artfully fomented by the men now in power, and their adherents, and directed against their predecessors. These prejudices and passions constitute the main pillar of the power of these men. In my opinion, they never will permit it to be wholly taken away from them. They never will permit the people of this country to look at them and their political opponents, free of that jaundice with which they have carefully imbued the vision of their own partisans. They never will consent to be weighed in a balance of mere merits; but will always take care to keep in reserve some portion of these British antipathies, to throw as a make-weight into the opposite scale, whenever they find their own sinking. To continue, multiply, strengthen, and extend these props of their power, has been, still is, the object of the daily study and the nightly vigils of our American Cabinet. For this the British Treaty was permitted to expire by its own limitation; notwithstanding the state of things which the Treaty of Amiens had produced in Europe was so little like permanent peace, that the occurrence of the fact, on which the force of that limitation depended, might easily have been questioned, with but little violence to the terms, and in perfect conformity with its spirit. For this a renewal of the Treaty of 1794 was refused by our Cabinet, although proffered by the British Government. For this the treaty negotiated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney in 1807 was rejected. For this, in 1811, fifty thousand dollars were paid out of the public Treasury to John Henry, for the obvious purpose of enabling the American Cabinet to calumniate their political opponents, on this very point of British influence, upon the eve of elections, occurring in Massachusetts, on the event of which the perpetuation of their own power was materially dependent.

Mr. Speaker, such men as these never will permit a state of things to pass away, so essential to their influence. Be it peace or war, arrangement or hostility, the association of these British antipathies in the minds of the mass of the community, with the characters of their political opponents, constitutes the great magazine of their power. This composes their whole political larder. It is, like Lord Peter's brown loaf, their "beef, mutton, veal, venison, partridge, plum-pudding, and custard."

From the time of the expiration of the British Treaty of 1794, and the refusal to renew it, the American Cabinet have been careful to precede negotiation with some circumstance or other, calculated to make it fail, or at least to make a successful result less certain. Thus in 1806, when, from the plunder of commerce, by British cruisers, a negotiation, notwithstanding the obvious reluctance of the Cabinet was forced upon them, by the clamors of the merchants, the non-importation law of April, in that year, was obtruded between the two countries. In the course of the debate upon that law, it was opposed upon this very ground, that it was an obstacle to a successful negotiation. It was advocated, like the bill now under discussion, as an aid to successful negotiation. It was also said, by the opponents of the law of 1806, that Great Britain would not negotiate under its operation, and that arrangement, attempted under proper auspices, could not be difficult, from the known interests and inclinations of that nation. What was the consequence? Precisely that which was anticipated. The then President of the United States was necessitated to come to this House, and recommend a suspension of the operation of that law, upon the openly avowed ground of its being expedient to give that evidence of a conciliatory disposition; really, because, if permitted to continue in operation, negotiation was found to be impracticable. After the suspension of that law, a treaty was formed. The merits of that treaty, it is not within the scope of my present argument to discuss. It is sufficient to say, it was deemed good enough to receive the sanction of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney. It arrived in America, and was rejected by the authority of a single individual; apparently because of the insufficiency of the arrangement about impressment. Really, because a settlement with Great Britain, at that time, did not "enter into the scope of the policy" of the American Cabinet. The negotiation was indeed renewed, but it was followed up with the enforcement of the non-importation law, and the enactment of the embargo. Both which steps were stated at the time, as they proved afterwards, to be of a nature to make hopeless successful negotiation.

In this state the Executive power of this nation formally passed into new hands, but substantially remained under the old principles of action, and subject to the former influences. It was desirable that a fund of popularity should be acquired for the new Administration. Accordingly an arrangement was made with Mr. Erskine, and no questions asked, concerning the adequacy of his powers. But, lest this circumstance should not defeat the proposed arrangement, a clause was inserted in the correspondence containing an insult to the British Government, offered in the face of the world, such as no man ever gave to a private individual whom he did not mean to offend. The President of the United States said, in so many words, to the person at the head of that Government, that he did not understand what belonged to his own honor, as well as it was understood by the President himself. The effect of such language was natural, it was necessary; it could not but render the British Government averse to sanction Mr. Erskine's arrangement. The effect was anticipated by Mr. Robert Smith, then acting as Secretary of State. He objected to its being inserted, but it was done in the President's own handwriting. As Mr. Erskine's authority was denied by the British Government, it is well known that, in fact, on the point of this indignity, the fate of that arrangement turned. Can any one doubt that our Cabinet meant that it should have this effect? I send you word, Mr. Speaker, that I have agreed with your messenger, and wish you to ratify it. I think you, however, no gentleman, notwithstanding; and that you do not understand, as well as I, what is "due to your own honor." What think you, sir? Would you ratify such an arrangement, if you could help it? Does a proffer of settlement, connected with such language, look like a disposition or an intention to conciliate? I appeal to the common sense of mankind on the point.

The whole state of the relations, induced between this country and Great Britain, in consequence of our embargo and restrictive systems; was, in fact, a standing appeal to the fears of the British Cabinet. For, notwithstanding those systems were equal in their terms, so far as they affected foreign Powers, yet their operation was notoriously almost wholly upon Great Britain. To yield to that pressure, or to anything which should foster, in this country, the idea that it was an effectual weapon of hostility, was nothing more than conceding that she was dependent upon us. A concession, which, when once made by her, was certain to encourage a resort to it by us on every occasion of difficulty between the two nations. Reasoning, therefore, upon the known nature of things, and the plain interests of Great Britain, it was foretold that, during its continuance, she would concede nothing. And the event has justified these predictions. But, the circumstance the most striking, and that furnishing the most conclusive evidence of the indisposition of the American Cabinet to peace, and their determination to carry on the war, is that connected with the pretended repeal of the French decrees, in November, 1810, and the consequent revival, in 1811, of our restrictive system against Great Britain.

If ever a body of men were pledged to anything, the American Cabinet, its friends, and supporters, were pledged for the truth of this fact: that the French decrees of Berlin and Milan were definitively repealed as it respects the United States, on the 1st of November, 1810. If ever any body of men staked their whole stock of reputation upon any point, our Cabinet did it on this. They and their partisans asserted and raved. They denounced every man as a British partisan who denied it. They declared the restrictive system was revived by the mere effect of the proclamation. But, lest the courts of law should not be as subservient to their policy as might be wished, they passed the law of the 2d of March, 1811, upon the basis of this repeal, and of its being definitive. The British Government refused, however, to recognise the validity of this repeal, and denied that the Berlin and Milan decrees were repealed, on the 1st of November, 1810, as our Cabinet asserted. Thus, then, stood the argument between the British Ministry and our Cabinet. The British Ministry admitted, that if the Berlin and Milan decrees were repealed, on the 1st of November, 1810, they were bound to revoke their Orders in Council. But they denied that repeal to exist. Our Cabinet, on the other hand, admitted, that if the Berlin and Milan decrees were not repealed, on the 1st of November, 1810, the restrictive system ought not to have been revived against Great Britain. But they asserted that repeal to exist. This was, virtually, the state of the question between the two countries on this point. And it is agreed, on all hands, that this refusal of the British Government, to repeal their Orders in Council, after the existence of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, as asserted by the American Cabinet, was the cause of the declaration of war between the two countries. So that, in truth, the question of the right of war depended upon the existence of that fact; for if that fact did not exist, even the American Cabinet did not pretend that, in the position in which things then stood, they had a right to declare war, on account of the continuance of the British Orders in Council.

Now, what is the truth in relation to this all-important fact, the definitive repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees on the 1st of November, 1810; the pivot upon which turned the revival of the restrictive system and our declaration of war? Why, sir, the event has proved that in relation to that fact the American Cabinet was, to say the least, in an error. Bonaparte himself, in a decree, dated the 28th of April, 1811, but not promulgated till a year afterwards, distinctly declares that the Berlin and Milan decrees were not definitively repealed, as relates to the United States, on the 1st of November, 1810. He also declares that they are then, on that 28th of April, for the first time, repealed. And he founds the issuing of this decree on the act of the American Congress of the 2d of March, 1811. That very act, which was passed upon the ground of the definitive repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, on the 1st of November, 1810; and which, it is agreed on all sides, the American Government were bound in honor not to pass, except in case of such antecedent repeal.

Were ever a body of men so abandoned, in the hour of need, as the American Cabinet, in this instance, by Bonaparte? Was ever any body of men so cruelly wounded in the house of their friend? This, this "was the unkindest cut of all." But how was it received by the American Cabinet? Surely they were indignant at this treatment. Surely the air rings with reproaches upon a man who has thus made them stake their reputation upon a falsehood; and then gives little less than the lie direct, to their assertions. No, sir, nothing of all this is heard from our Cabinet. There is a philosophic tameness that would be remarkable, if it were not, in all cases, affecting Bonaparte, characteristic. All the Executive of the United States has found it in his heart to say, in relation to this last decree of Bonaparte, which contradicts his previous allegations and asseverations, is, that "This proceeding is rendered, by the time and manner of it, liable to many objections!"

I have referred to this subject as being connected, with future conduct, strikingly illustrative of the disposition of the American Cabinet to carry on the war, and of their intention, if possible, not to make peace. Surely, if any nation had a claim for liberal treatment from another, it was the British nation from the American, after the discovery of the error of the American Government, in relation to the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, in November, 1810. In consequence of that error, the American Cabinet had ruined numbers of our own citizens, who had been caught by the revival of the non-intercourse law; they had revived that law against Great Britain, under circumstances, which now appeared to have been fallacious; and they had declared war against her, on the supposition, that she had refused to repeal her Orders in Council, after the French decrees were in fact revoked; whereas, it now appears that they were in fact not revoked. Surely the knowledge of this error was followed by an instant and anxious desire to redress the resulting injury. As the British Orders in Council were in fact revoked, on the knowledge of the existence of the French decree of repeal, surely the American Cabinet at once extended the hand of friendship; met the British Government half way; stopped all further irritation; and strove to place everything on a basis best suited to promote an amicable adjustment. No, sir, nothing of all this occurred. On the contrary, the question of impressments is made the basis of continuing the war. On this subject, a studied fairness of proposition is preserved, accompanied with systematic perseverance in measures of hostility. An armistice was proposed by them. It was refused by us. It was acceded to by the American General on the frontiers. It was rejected by the Cabinet. No consideration of the false allegation on which the war in fact was founded; no consideration of the critical and extremely consequential nature to both nations of the subject of impressment; no considerations of humanity, interposed their influence. They renewed hostilities. They rushed upon Canada. Nothing would satisfy them but blood. The language of their conduct is that of the giant, in the legends of infancy:

"Fee, faw, fow, fum,
I smell the blood of an Englishman;
Dead or alive, I will have some!"

Can such men pretend that peace is their object? Whatever may result, the perfect conviction of my mind is, that they have no such intention, and that if it comes it is contrary both to their hope and expectation.

I would not judge these men severely. But it is my duty to endeavor to judge them truly; and to express fearlessly the result of that judgment, whatever it may be. My opinion results from the application of the well known principle of judging concerning men's purposes and motives: To consider rather what men do, than what they say; and to examine their deeds in connexion with predominating passions and interests; and on this basis decide. In making an estimate of the intentions of these or any other politicians, I make little or no account of pacific pretensions. There is a general reluctance at war, and desire of peace, which pervades the great mass of every people; and artful rulers could never keep any nation at war any length of time, beyond their true interests, without some sacrifice to that general love of peace which exists in civilized men. Bonaparte himself will tell you that he is the most pacific creature in the world. He has already declared, by his proclamation to Frenchmen, that he has gone to Moscow for no other end than to cultivate peace, and counteract the Emperor of Russia's desire of war. In this country, where the popular sentiment has so strong an impulse on its affairs, the same obtrusive pretension must inevitably be preserved. No man or set of men ever can or will get this country at war, or continue it long in war, without keeping on hand a stout, round stock of gulling matter. Fair propositions will always be made to go hand in hand with offensive acts. And when something is offered so reasonable that no man can doubt but it will be accepted, at the same moment something will be done of a nature to embarrass the project, and if not to defeat at least to render its acceptance dubious. How this has been in past time, I have shown. I will now illustrate what is doing and intended at present.

As from the uniform tenor of the conduct of the American Cabinet, in relation to the British Government, I have no belief that their intention has been to make a solid arrangement with that nation; so, from the evidence of their disposition and intention, existing abroad and on the table, I have no belief that such is at present their purpose. I cannot possibly think otherwise, than that such is not their intention. Let us take the case into common life. I have demands, Mr. Speaker, against you, very just in their nature, but different. Some of recent, others of very old date. The former depending upon principles very clearly in my favor. The latter critical, difficult, and dubious, both in principle and settlement. In this state of things, and during your absence, I watch my opportunity, declare enmity; throw myself upon your children and servants and property, which happen to be in my neighborhood, and do them all the injury I can. While I am doing this, I receive a messenger from you, stating that the grounds of the recent injury are settled; that you comply fully with my terms. Your servants and children, whom I am plundering and killing, invite me to stay my hand until you return, or until some accommodation can take place between us. But, deaf to any such suggestions, I prosecute my intention of injury to the utmost. When there is reason to expect your return, I multiply my means of injury and offence. And no sooner do I hear of your arrival, than I thrust my fist into your face, and say to you—"Well, sir, here are fair propositions of settlement; come to my terms, which are very just; settle the old demand in my way, and we will be as good friends as ever." Mr. Speaker, what would be your conduct on such an occasion? Would you be apt to look as much at the nature of the propositions, as at the temper of the assailant? If you did not at once return blow for blow, and injury for injury, would you not at least take a little time to consider? Would you not tell such an assailant, that you were not to be bullied nor beaten into any concession? If you settled at all, might you not consider it your duty in some way to make him feel the consequences of his strange intemperance of passion? For myself, I have no question how a man of spirit ought to act under such circumstances. I have as little, how a great nation, like Great Britain, will act. Now, I have no doubt, sir, that the American Cabinet view this subject in the same light. They understand well, that by the declaration of war, the invasion of Canada, the refusal of an armistice, and perseverance in hostilities, after the principal ground of war had been removed, they have wrought the minds of the British Cabinet and people to a very high state of irritation. Now is the very moment to get up some grand scheme of pacification; such as may persuade the American people of the inveterate love of our Cabinet for peace, and make them acquiescent in their perseverance in hostilities. Accordingly, before the end of the session, a great tub will be thrown out to the whale. Probably, a little while before the Spring elections, terms of very fair import will be proffered to Great Britain. Such as, perhaps, six months ago our Cabinet would not have granted, had she solicited them on her knees. Such as probably, in the opinion of the people of this country, Great Britain ought to accept; such perhaps as in any other state of things, she would have accepted. But such, as I fear, under the irritation produced by the strange course pursued by the American Cabinet, that nation will not accept. Sir, I do not believe that our Cabinet expect that they will be accepted. They think the present state of induced passion is sufficient to prevent arrangement. But to make assurance doubly sure, to take a bond of fate, that arrangement shall not happen, they prepare this bill. A bill, which proposes an augmentation of the army for the express purpose of conquering the Canadas. A bill which, connected with the recent disposition evinced by our Cabinet, in relation to those provinces, and with the avowed intent of making their subjugation the means of peace, through the fear to be inspired into Great Britain, is as offensive to the pride of that nation as can well be imagined; and is, in my apprehension, as sure a guarantee of continued war as could be given. On these grounds, my mind cannot force itself to any other conclusion than this, that the avowed object of this bill is the true one; that the Canadas are to be invaded the next season; that the war is to be protracted; and that this is the real policy of the American Cabinet.

I will now reply to those invitations to "union," which have been so obtrusively urged upon us. If by this call to union is meant an union in a project for the invasion of Canada, or for the invasion of East Florida, or for the conquest of any foreign country whatever, either as a means of carrying on this war or for any other purpose, I answer, distinctly, I will unite with no man nor any body of men for any such purposes. I think such projects criminal in the highest degree, and ruinous to the prosperity of these States. But, if by this invitation is meant union in preparation for defence, strictly so called; union in fortifying our seaboard; union in putting our cities into a state of safety; union in raising such a military force as shall be sufficient with the local militia in the hands of the Constitutional leaders, the Executives of the States, to give a rational degree of security against any invasion; sufficient to defend our frontiers, sufficient to awe into silence the Indian tribes within our Territories; union in creating such a maritime force as shall command the seas on the American coasts, and keep open the intercourse, at least between the States; if this is meant, I have no hesitation; union on such principles you shall have from me cordially and faithfully. And this, too, sir, without any reference to the state of my opinion, in relation to the justice or necessity of this war. Because I well understand such to be the condition of man, in a social compact, that he must partake of the fate of the society to which he belongs, and must submit to the privations and sacrifices its defence requires, notwithstanding these may be the result of the vices or crimes of its immediate rulers. But there is a great difference between supporting such rulers in plans of necessary self-defence, on which the safety of our altars and firesides especially depend, and supporting them in projects of foreign invasion, and encouraging them in schemes of conquest and ambition, which are not only unjust in themselves, but dreadful in their consequences; inasmuch as, let the particular project result as it may, the general effect must be, according to human view, destructive to our own domestic liberties and Constitution. I speak as an individual. Sir, for my single self, did I support such projects, as are avowed to be the objects of this bill, I should deem myself a traitor to my country. Were I even to aid them by loan, or in any other way, I should consider myself a partaker in the guilt of the purpose. But when these projects of an invasion shall be abandoned; when men yield up schemes which not only openly contemplate the raising of a great military force, but also the concentrating them at one point and placing them in one hand; schemes obviously ruinous to the fates of a free Republic—as they comprehend the means by which such have ever heretofore been destroyed; when, I say, such schemes shall be abandoned, and the wishes of the Cabinet limited to mere defence and frontier and maritime protection, there will be no need of calls to union. For such objects there is not, there cannot be, but one heart and soul in this people.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that while I utter these things a thousand tongues and a thousand pens are preparing without doors to overwhelm me if possible by their pestiferous gall. Already I hear in the air the sound of "traitor," "British agent," "British gold," and all those changes of vulgar calumny, by which the imaginations of the mass of men are affected, and by which they are prevented from listening to what is true and receiving what is reasonable.

Mr. Speaker, it well becomes any man, standing in the presence of such a nation as this, to speak of himself seldom; and such a man as I am, it becomes to speak of himself not at all; except indeed when the relations in which he stands to his country are little known, and when the assertion of those relations has some connexion, and may have some influence on interests which it is peculiarly incumbent upon him to support.

Under this sanction, I say, it is not for a man whose ancestors have been planted in this country now for almost two centuries; it is not for a man who has a family, and friends, and character, and children, and a deep stake in the soil; it is not for a man who is self-conscious of being rooted in that soil, as deeply and as exclusively as the oak which shoots among its rocks; it is not for such a man to hesitate or swerve a hair's breadth from his country's purpose and true interests, because of the yelpings, the howlings, and snarlings of that hungry pack which corrupt men keep directly or indirectly in pay, with the view of hunting down every man who dare develop their purposes; a pack composed it is true of some native curs, but for the most part of hounds and spaniels of very recent importation, whose backs are seared by the lash, and whose necks are sore with the collars of their former masters. In fulfilling his duty, the lover of his country must often be obliged to breast the shock of calumny. If called to that service he will meet the exigency with the same firmness, as, should another occasion call, he would breast the shock of battle. No, sir, I am not to be deterred by such apprehensions. May Heaven so deal with me and mine, as I am true or faithless to the best interests of this people! May it deal with me according to its just judgments when I fail to bring men and measures to the bar of public opinion, and to expose projects and systems of policy which I realize to be ruinous to the peace, prosperity, and liberties of my country!

This leads me, naturally, to the third and last point of view, at which I proposed to consider this bill—as a means for the advancement of the objects of the personal or local ambition of the members of the American Cabinet. With respect to the members of that Cabinet, I may almost literally say, I know nothing of them except as public men. Against them, I have no personal animosity. I know little of them in private life, and that little never made me ambitious to know more. I look at them as public men, wielding powers and putting in operation means and instruments, materially affecting the interests and prospects of the United States.

It is a curious fact, but no less true than curious, that for these twelve years past the whole affairs of this country have been managed, and its fortunes reversed, under the influence of a Cabinet little less than despotic, composed, to all efficient purposes, of two Virginians and a foreigner. When I speak of these men as Virginians, I mean to cast no odium upon that State, as though it were not entitled to its full share of influence in the national councils; nor when I refer to one of them as being a foreigner, do I intend thereby to suggest any connexions of a nature unworthy or suspicious. I refer to these circumstances as general and undoubted facts which belong to the characters of the Cabinet, and which cannot fail to be taken into view in all estimates of plans and projects, so long as man is constituted as he is, and so long as the prejudices and principles of childhood never fail to influence in different degrees, in even the best men, the course of thinking and action of their ripper years.

I might have said, perhaps with more strict propriety, that it was a Cabinet composed of three Virginians and a foreigner; because once in the course of the twelve years there has been a change of one of the characters. But, sir, that change was notoriously matter of form rather than substance. As it respects the Cabinet, the principles continued the same; the interests the same; the objects at which it aimed, the same.

I said that this Cabinet had been during these twelve years little less than despotic. This fact also is notorious. During this whole period the measures distinctly recommended have been adopted by the two Houses of Congress, with as much uniformity and with as little modification, too, as the measures of the British Ministry have been adopted during the same period by the British Parliament. The connexion between Cabinet Councils and Parliamentary acts is just as intimate in the one country as in the other.

I said that these three men constituted, to all efficient purposes, the whole Cabinet. This also is notorious. It is true that during this period other individuals have been called into the Cabinet. But they were all of them comparatively minor men, such as had no great weight, either of personal talents or of personal influence, to support them. They were kept as instruments of the master spirits. And when they failed to answer the purpose, or became restive, they were sacrificed or provided for. The shades were made to play upon the curtain. They entered. They bowed to the audience. They did what they were bidden. They said what was set down for them. When those who pulled the wires saw fit, they passed away. No man knew why they entered. No man knew why they departed. No man could tell whence they came. No man asked whither they were gone.

From this uniform composition of the Cabinet, it is obvious that the project of the master spirits was that of essential influence within the Cabinet. For, in such a country as ours, so extended, and its interests so complicated, it is impossible but those who would conduct its affairs wisely, and with a single eye to the public good, should strive to call around themselves the highest and most independent talents in the nation, at least of their own political friends. When this is not the case, it must be apparent that the leading influences want not associates, but instruments. The same principle applies to the distribution of office out of the Cabinet, as to filling places within it. Some mistakes may be expected to happen in selections among candidates for appointments at a distance; but if, at any time, a Cabinet shall be systematically guided in such selection by a regard not to merit or qualifications, but to electioneering services; if the obvious design be to reward partisans and encourage defection to its party standard, then the people may rest assured that the project such Cabinet has in view is not to serve the public interest, but to secure their personal influence; and that they want not competency for the employment, but subserviency in it. How this matter is, I shall not assert; not because I have not very distinct opinions upon the subject, but because the sphere of appointment is too extensive to be comprehended in the grasp of a single individual; and I mean to make no assertion concerning motive or conduct, of which there does not exist in my mind evidence as well complete as conclusive. I refer to this subject, therefore, only as a collateral and corroborative proof of the purposes of the Cabinet. Every man can decide for himself, in his own circle or neighborhood, concerning the apparent principle upon which the Cabinet have proceeded in making appointments; remembering, always, the section of country against whose prosperity the policy of the Cabinet is most systematically levelled, will be that in which subserviency to all its purposes will be most studiously inculcated among its adherents; it will be in that quarter that the flames of party animosity will be enkindled with the most sedulous assiduity; as a means of making men forgetful of their true interests and obedient to their employers, in spite of their natural prejudices and inclinations.

It is natural to inquire what are the projects connected with a Cabinet, thus composed, and to what ends it is advancing? To answer this question, it is necessary to look into the nature and relations of things. Here the true criterions of judgment are to be found. Professions are always plausible. Why, sir, Bonaparte himself is the very milk of human kindness; he is the greatest lover of his species in the world; he would not hurt a sparrow, if you would take his own account of the matter. What, then, do nature and the relations of things teach? They teach this, that the great hazard in a Government where the Chief Magistrate is elective, is from the local ambition of States and the personal ambition of individuals. It is no reflection upon any State to say that it is ambitious. According to their opportunities and temptations, all States are ambitious; this quality is as much predicable of States as of individuals. Indeed, State ambition has its root in the same passions of human nature, and derives its strength from the same nutriment, as personal ambition. All history shows that such passions always exist among States, combined in Confederacies. To deny it, is to deceive ourselves: it has existed, it does exist, and always must exist. In our political relations, as in our personal, we then walk most safely when we walk with reference to the actual existence of things; admit the weaknesses, and do not hide from ourselves the dangers to which our nature is exposed. Whatever is true, let us confess. Nations, as well as individuals, are only safe in proportion as they attain self-knowledge, and regulate their conduct by it.

What fact, upon this point, does our own experience present? It presents this striking one—that, taking the years for which the Presidential chair is already filled, into the account, out of twenty-eight years since our Constitution was established, the single State of Virginia has furnished the President for twenty-four years. And further, it is now as distinctly known, and familiarly talked about in this city and vicinity, who is the destined successor of the present President, after the expiration of his ensuing term, and known, too, that he is to be a Virginian, as it was known and familiarly talked about during the Presidency of Mr. Jefferson, that the present President was to be his successor. And the former was, and the latter is, a subject of as much notoriety, and to human appearance, of as much certainty, too, as who will be the successor to the British Crown is a matter of notoriety in that country. To secure the succession, and keep it in the destined line, has been, is, and will continue to be, the main object of the policy of these men. This is the point on which the projects of the Cabinet, for the three years past, have been brought to bear—that James the First should be made to continue four years longer. And this is the point on which the projects of the Cabinet will be brought to bear for the three years to come—that James the Second shall be made to succeed, according to the fundamental rescripts of the Monticellian dynasty.

[Mr. QUINCY was here again called to order. The SPEAKER said that, really, the gentleman laid his premises so remote from his conclusions, that he could not see how his observations applied to the bill.]

Mr. QUINCY proceeded.—On the contrary, sir, I maintain that both my premises and conclusions are very proximate to each other, and intimately connected with the bill on the table, and with the welfare of this people.

Is it not within the scope of just debate to show that the general policy of the Cabinet, and that also this particular project, have for their object the aggrandizement of the Cabinet themselves, or some member of it? If this be the object of the bill, is it not proper to be exhibited? The topic may be of a nature high and critical, but no man can deny that it is both important and relevant. To secure the power they at present possess, to perpetuate it in their own hands, and to transfer it to their selected favorites, is the great project of the policy of the members of our Cabinet. It would be easy to trace to this master passion the declaration of war, at the time and under the circumstances in which it occurred. Antecedent to the declaration of war, it was distinctly stated, by individuals from that quarter of the country, under the influence of which this war was adopted, that the support of the present President of the United States by their quarter of the country depended upon the fact of the Cabinet's coming up to the point of war with Great Britain. This state of things, and the knowledge of it by the members of the Cabinet, was repeatedly urged in conversation by members of this and the other branch of the Legislature, to shake the credulity in a declaration of war which at that time existed in some of our minds. Without placing any reliance on the reports of that day, this I assert unequivocally, and without fear of contradiction, that such were the passions which existed in the Southern and Western States, and such the avowed determination to war, that, had not the Cabinet come up to that point, its influence in those quarters was at an end; without their support, the re-election of the present Chief Magistrate was hopeless. Now, sir, when continuance of power is put into the scale—as in this instance it was, unquestionably—it is not for human nature to deny that it had not a material influence in determining the balance. For myself, I had never had but one opinion on this matter; I have never doubted that we should not have had war declared at the last session, if the Presidential election had not been pending.

Just so with respect to the invasion of Canada. It was, in my judgment, a test required by the state of opinion in the Southern and Western States of the sincerity of the Cabinet, and of its heartiness in the prosecution of this war. This accounts for the strange and headlong haste, and the want of sufficient preparation with which the invasion was expedited; this accounts for the neglect to meet the proposition for an armistice, when made by the Governor of Canada, after a knowledge of the revocation of the Orders in Council; this accounts for the obtrusive attempts to gain a footing in Canada, and the obstinate perseverance in the show of invasion, until the members of the Electoral Colleges had been definitely selected. Since which event our armies have been quiet enough. When I see a direct dependence between the perpetuation of power in any hand, and the adoption of, and the perseverance in, any particular course of measures, I cannot refrain from believing that such a course has been suggested and regulated by so obvious and weighty an interest. This subject is capable of much greater elucidation; but, according to your suggestion, sir, I shall confine myself to trace the connexion of this master passion of the Cabinet with the bill now under consideration.

The projects of the Cabinet, for the present year, are loans to the amount at least of twenty millions; an army of fifty-five thousand men; a grand scheme of pacification, founded on some legislative acts or resolves, and a perpetuation of the war. The loans are expected to be filled, partly from the popularity derived in the commercial cities, by the vote for building seventy-four; partly by opening offices for receiving subscriptions in the interior. Whatever is received will be diverted to the Army service. The grand scheme of pacification will be made to appear very fair, in terms, but in the state of irritation which has been produced in Great Britain by the continuance of the war, after the repeal of the Orders in Council, and by the pertinacious perseverance in the threats and preparation to invade Canada, will, it is expected, be rejected by her. This, it is supposed, will give popularity to the war in this country. The forty dollars bounty, will, it is hoped, fill the ranks. The Army, for the conquest of Canada, will be raised. To be commanded, by whom? This is the critical question. The answer is in every man's mouth. By a member of the American Cabinet; by one of the three; by one of that "trio," who, at this moment, constitute in fact, and who efficiently have always constituted, the whole Cabinet. And the man who is thus intended for the command of the greatest army this New World ever contained—an army nearly twice as great as was at any time the regular army of our Revolution; I say the man who is intended for this great trust is the individual who is notoriously the selected candidate for the next Presidency.

Mr. Speaker, when I assert that the present Secretary of State, who is now the acting Secretary at War, is destined, by a Cabinet of which he himself constitutes one-third, for the command of this Army, I know that I assert intentions to exist, which have not yet developed themselves, by an official avowal. The truth is, the moment for an official avowal is not yet come. The Cabinet must work along by degrees, and only show their cards as they play them. The Army must first be authorized. The bill for the new Major Generals must be passed. Then, upon their plan, it will be found necessary to constitute a Lieutenant General. "And who so proper," the Cabinet will exclaim, "as one of ourselves?" "And who so proper as one of the Cabinet?" all its retainers will respond, from one end of the Continent to the other. I would willingly have postponed any animadversion upon this intention of the Cabinet until it should have been avowed. But, then, it would have been too late. Then, the fifty-five thousand men would have been authorized, and the necessity for a Lieutenant General inevitable. Sir, I know very well that this public animadversion may, possibly, stagger the Cabinet in its purpose. They may not like to proceed in the design after the public eye has been directed distinctly upon it. And the existence of it will be denied, and its partisans will assert that this suggestion was mere surmise. Be it so. It is comparatively, of little importance what happens to my person or character, provided this great evil can be averted from my country. I consider the raising of such an army as this, and the putting it under the command of that individual, taking into view his connexion with the present Cabinet, so ominous to the liberties of this country, that I am not anxious what happens to me, if, by any Constitutional responsibility, I can prevent it.

However, to the end that it may not be thought I have made this assertion lightly, I will briefly state the evidence upon which it is founded, and which, to my mind, has given perfect satisfaction of the intentions of the Cabinet.

First. As long ago as last June, it was, to my knowledge, asserted by individuals connected with the Administration, in this and the other branch of the Legislature, that it was the intention of the American Cabinet to place the Secretary of State at the head of the Army.

Second. This intention was, early in the present session, distinctly avowed by members in this and the other branch of the Legislature, to be the intention of the Cabinet. And these members were persons intimate with the Cabinet, and connected with them in politics, and of all men the most likely to know their intentions. This can be proved, if denied. But it will not be. I do not believe there is a man on this floor who is not acquainted with the fact as well as myself.

Third. As soon as the session opened, the old Secretary of War was hunted down.

Fourth. The burden of the whole Department of War is now transferred to the shoulders of the Secretary of State. This great and oppressive trust, which, at the last session, it was seriously urged, no single living wight could bear, but that it required three persons to support its pressure, is now cast solely upon this individual, who, it seems, is able to uphold the mighty mountain of that Department in one hand, while he balances the Department of State in the other.

Fifth. The Secretary of State has not merely entered into a still-life possession of the Department of War. He is actively employed in arranging its details, and putting it into a state of preparation. This work of drudgery, it can hardly be expected that any man would undertake, for the sake of an unknown successor, unless he had himself some prospect of interest in it.

Sixth. The Secretary of State is no sooner in possession of the Department of War, than the plan of a great army, an efficient pecuniary bounty, and a brilliant campaign against Canada, is promulgated. Of all which, he is the known author, having communicated to the Committee on Military Affairs the whole project, not only in general, but in its details. Above all, that no doubt concerning the ultimate purpose may exist—

Seventh. Immediately after the Secretary of State enters upon the duties of Secretary of War, he puts to Adjutant-General Cushing this question: "How many Major Generals and Brigadiers are necessary for an army of thirty-five thousand men?" Now, as this question was put by authority, and was intended to be communicated to Congress, and was, in its nature, very ample, one would have supposed, that it would have been enough, in all conscience, to have given to it a direct answer. Besides, it is not always thought proper for those who are in the under grades of departments, when one question is proposed, to enter into the discussion of another. However, notwithstanding these obvious suggestions, one half of the whole reply of General Cushing is taken up in investigating, not the question which was asked, but the question on which the honest Adjutant, in the simplicity of his soul, tells the Secretary: "You have not required my opinion." The whole of this part of the letter runs thus:

"In this country, we have never had a grade between the Commander-in-Chief and that of Major General; hence, it was found necessary, in the 'Continental army,' to give to the senior Major General the command of the right wing, and to the next in rank that of the left; which, from the limited number of general officers, often left a division to a brigadier, a brigade to a colonel, and a regiment to a subordinate field officer; but, in Europe, this difficulty is obviated, by the appointment of general officers of higher grades.

"From the best information I have been able to obtain on this subject, I have no hesitation in saying, that eight Major Generals and sixteen Brigadiers, to command the divisions and brigades of an army of thirty-five thousand men, is the lowest estimate which the uniform practice of France, Russia, and England, will warrant; and that this is much below the proportion of officers of these grades actually employed in the army of the Revolution.

"As you have not required my opinion, whether it be necessary to have a higher grade than that of Major General, I have not deemed it proper to touch this subject; and have confined myself to the number of Major Generals and Brigadiers, deemed necessary to command the divisions and brigades of an army of thirty-five thousand men. It may not, however, be improper to remark that, if it is intended to have no higher grade than that of Major General, their number should be increased to eleven; so as to give one for the chief command, one for each wing, and one for each division, of four thousand men."

It is entertaining to see how much trouble the worthy Adjutant takes to impress upon the mind, that the Secretary of State "had not required his opinion," on the subject of a grade higher than that of a Major General. He even goes so far as to say, that he has "not deemed it proper to touch this subject."

Now, sir, I think he has touched the subject, and treated it pretty thoroughly, too. For he has shown, not only that it is "difficult" to do without, but that it is more economical to have a grade higher than a Major General. And this, too, in an army of only thirty-five thousand men. But when this bill passes, the army will consist of fifty-five thousand. The result is, then, inevitable; you must have, in such case, a grade higher than a Major General; in other words, a Lieutenant General. Such, it cannot be denied, is the intention of the Cabinet. As little can it be denied, that the Secretary of State, the acting Secretary of War, is the Cabinet candidate for that office. So it has been distinctly avowed by the friends and confidants of that Cabinet. And, as such, I have no question, is known by every individual in this House.

Mr. Speaker, what an astonishing and alarming state of things is this! Three men, who efficiently have had the command of this nation, for many years, have so managed its concerns as to reduce it from an unexampled height of prosperity to a state of great depression, not to say ruin. They have annihilated its commerce, and involved it in war. And now the result of the whole matter is, that they are about to raise an army of fifty-five thousand men, invest one of their own body with this most solemn command, and he the man who is the destined candidate for the President's chair! What a grasp at power is this! What is there in history equal to it! Can any man doubt what will be the result of this project? No man can believe that the conquest of Canada will be effected in one campaign. It cost the British six years to acquire it, when it was far weaker than at present. It cannot be hoped that we can acquire it under three or four years. And what, then, will be the situation of this army and our country? Why, then, the army will be veteran; and the leader, a candidate for the Presidency! And whoever is a candidate for the Presidency, with an army of thirty thousand veterans at his heels, will not be likely to be troubled with rivals, or to concern himself about votes. A President, elected under such auspices, may be nominally a President for years; but, really, if he pleases, a President for life.

I know that all this will seem wild and fantastical to very many, perhaps to all who hear me. To my mind, it is neither the one nor the other. History is full of events less probable, and effected by armies far inferior to that which is proposed to be raised. So far from deeming it mere fancy, that I consider it absolutely certain, if this army be once raised, organized, and enter upon a successful career of conquest. The result of such a power as this, intrusted to a single individual in the present state of parties and passions in this country, no man can anticipate. There is no other means of absolute safety, but denying it altogether.

I cannot forget, sir, that the sphere in which this great army is destined to operate, is in the neighborhood of that section of country where, it is probable, in case the present destructive measures be continued in operation, the most unanimous opposition will exist to a perpetuation of power in the present hand; or to its transfer to its destined successor. I cannot forget that it has been distinctly avowed by a member on this floor; a gentleman from Virginia, too, (Mr. CLAY,) and one very likely to know the views of the Cabinet, that "one object of this army was to put down opposition."

Sir, the greatness of this project, and its consequences, overwhelm my mind. I know very well to what obloquy I expose myself by this development. I know that it is always an unpardonable sin to pull the veil from the party dei-ties of the day; and that it is of a nature not to be forgiven, either by them or their worshippers. I have not willingly, nor without long reflection, taken upon myself this responsibility. But it has been forced upon me by an imperious sense of duty. If the people of the Northern and Eastern States are destined to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, to men who know nothing about their interests, and care nothing about them, I am clear of the great transgression. If, in common with their countrymen, my children are destined to be slaves, and to yoke in with negroes, chained to the car of a Southern master, they, at least, shall have this sweet consciousness as the consolation of their condition, they shall be able to say: "Our father was guiltless of these chains."

Mr. RHEA said, he would vote for the bill, believing the provisions thereof not only right, but necessary. The object is to raise an additional regular force for one year, and to repeal the law respecting volunteers; and, if conjecture may be indulged, the force contemplated by this bill will be less expensive than that contemplated by the law intended to be repealed.

This bill is opposed on the ground that the force contemplated by it (and the gentleman who has finished his explanation of his opinions appears to entertain that notion) is inadequate to the purpose intended by it. Are the purposes known for which it is intended? Will that be expressly said? will the gentleman who last spoke on the subject say it? He says he will vote against the passage of the bill, because he deems it inadequate to the purpose intended; then, it is presumed, he has plunged into futurity and acquired a complete knowledge of future events; if he has not acquired that knowledge, his vote against the bill will be without the reason for which he says he will vote, and so far as relates to that particular reason, that vote will be unsupported. To convince a gentleman who voted against the war, believing it wrong, that now it is right, is nearly, if not altogether impossible, and a vote, in such case, for a measure in support of the war is not to be expected, for it is presumed a course taken will not be abandoned. By what calculation is that knowledge obtained which takes for granted that the force intended by the bill is designed to conquer Canada? Is this knowledge derived from a calculation of the number of regiments and troops already existing by law? Any calculation of that kind will fail in the conclusion. But, it seems, that the honor of the country forbids a strict inquiry into the number of troops now existing on the Military Establishment. Well, so far, then, the honor of the country is safe; but will the honor of the country be supported by a negative vote? A term of enlistment for twelve months is said to be too short a period for service; a term of five years heretofore probably was too long; any middle term might also be objected to. Why? Only because the war was deemed improper; and, of course, every measure to support the war is also deemed improper. The war is against Great Britain, by reason of the many aggressions and usurpations which that Power, for a series of years, has been in the perpetration of against the persons, property, and sovereignty, of the United States. If the war be, as it is said to be, wrong and improper, what is that course of conduct which would have been right for the United States to have pursued? Would submission to the will of Great Britain have been right? War or submission were the only alternatives, and a vote for the war was a vote against submission. The unprofitable business of negotiation need not be taken into view to manifest the anxiety of the United States to maintain peace. These motives are known to the sovereign people of this nation; they are known to the people of the British Empire, who may have dispassionately examined the volumes of that chaotic negotiation; chaotic by reason of the many windings of the British Government, which ended in nothing.

The United States drank the very dregs of the cup of disappointment arising from negotiation. War then remained to be adopted in place of fruitless negotiation; but that war, it seems, is improper, and so is every measure to support the war. If the bill declaring war had been negatived by a vote of this House, what would have been the consequence? Great Britain had, to negotiation, refused justice. The consequences need not be mentioned; they will present themselves to the impartial inquirer. If, after war was declared, every measure to support that war had been refused and withheld, similar or worse consequences would have followed; but an unanimity in few cases is to be expected, much less in a case so important as a declaration of war, or of measures to carry it on.

But it has been said, and truly, too, that in the commencement of the war, the United States have suffered disasters; two cases of that description have occurred, one at Detroit, the other at Queenstown. At Detroit, an army composed of brave, determined, and warlike men, were, for some reason or other, surrendered without resistance to the enemy. This case may be passed over without comment, until a development of it in a proper manner be made; but this much is noticed, that detached parties of that army were led in battle against parties of the enemy, were victorious, and, on every trial, proved themselves the brave defenders of the rights of their country. In relation to the disaster at Queenstown, little need now be said, because the respectable and gallant officer who commanded at that battle, has, in his published statement, very fully accounted for it, and manifested the cause thereof; but where did ever troops fight and contend against an enemy with more virtue and unremitting courage than the troops of the United States did who fought that battle? and although they were ultimately overpowered by numbers greatly superior, they nevertheless proved themselves the worthy defenders of the rights of their country, and have acquired for themselves a name of renown, which will be remembered as long as the heights of Queenstown shall remain. The gallant, brave men, there engaged with the enemy, gave a specimen of what American citizen-soldiers can do, and if a few hundred more men, such as they were, had been with them, the heights of Queenstown would have witnessed the ruin of the defeated and captured enemy. Let us not talk about these disasters now; sufficient about them has been said. Every American heart felt chagrin because of the surrender of the army at Detroit, and in the heart of every American is erected a monument in remembrance of the heroes who fell in defence of American rights at the battle of Queenstown. These two cases have been noticed by the highest officer in this nation, in a manner the most magnanimous and expressive of his confidence in the exertions and success of this nation. Let the Legislature of this Union provide, so that similar cases in future may be prevented.

Mr. R. here gave way for an adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, January 6.

Mr. BOND presented a petition of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, praying that four companies of mounted rangers may be raised for the protection of their Territory against the hostile Indians.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McKIM, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, praying the removal of the Loan Office to Baltimore, made a detailed report thereon, and asked for leave to report by bill. After some objections by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and replies thereto by Mr. McKIM and Mr. ARCHER, leave was given, and a bill reported, "to remove the office of Commissioner of Loans, for the State of Maryland, to Baltimore;" which was read twice, and committed.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the order of the day, being the bill for raising an additional military force of 20,000 men for one year.

Mr. REEA said, in examining the merits of this bill an extensive range is taken in opposition to it; the bill itself sometimes is obscured by recitations of matter of negotiation heretofore talked about, and, without effect, endeavored by the United States. Considerable labor and argumentation has been undergone to show that in business of negotiation England was always right, and continually willing to do right to the United States, and that the United States somehow or other were always so unfortunate as to be doing something precedent, which hindered them from obtaining and enjoying the many good things which England has to bestow and freely give to those who will by due respect and proper submission merit them. Everything relative to that long and unprofitable negotiation might as well be omitted and left to rest in oblivion, at least in this House; and more especially because the documents containing all the unsuccessful business have been spread before the American people, and the thing itself has been worn threadbare long ago.

H. OF R.

The causes and reasons which induced the war are also discussed with great care and attention, and elaborate argument used to show that the United States had no first cause of war against England, and that if the United States had any cause of war against England, England was willing to take it away; and if was not taken away, it was owing to the unfriendly conduct of the United States. Such is the substance of arguments introduced on this occasion to show this bill ought not to be a law. The causes and reasons inducing the war are known to the people of this nation. They have formed their opinion thereon, and, therefore, less may be said. There is, however, a cause of the war, and of the continuance of it, which in proper time will be adverted to.

In opposing the bill under consideration, the aggressions and usurpations of England against the United States are not brought into view with perceivable distinction generally, and, where they are, England fighting for existence is excusable; being forced to do what she does in retaliation against France her enemy. It might, however, be as well to let the conduct of England appear in its true colors towards the United States; in the colors in which it is—colors, which no brush can wipe off, and which are of so peculiar a nature, and so agreeable to their subject, that to varnish them over or discolor them is impossible; colors, durable as time itself, not composed of the perishable ingredients of colors used by great painters of past ages. Seeing the causes of the war are noticed, let the plain facts show themselves, and they will appear to be, that England has for several years past, to enrich and aggrandize herself and to humble the United States, carried on war in disguise against them. In carrying on that war in disguise, she unjustly took the property of our citizens, impressed the seamen, and violated in many instances the sovereignty of the United States. The impartial history of the times will manifest that she perpetrated these aggressions and usurpations, that the United States did everything a nation ought to do to preserve peace—but England would not suffer it to be so. The United States, in defence and vindication of their rights, appealed to arms and declared war, after all hope of indemnity for the past and security for the future injuries, by negotiation, had ceased. Notwithstanding all this, attempts are made to show that the war on the part of the United States is unjust, that the declaration of war was an act of folly and madness, and that being unjust it cannot be attended with success, and the war is said to be foreign and offensive.

The United States for several years endeavored to defend and vindicate their rights against the aggressions and usurpations of England, by negotiation, in the most friendly manner, but without effect; they then with the same object in view, that is, to defend and vindicate their rights against the aggressions and usurpations of England, declared war, and for that reason they who were and are for war, named it a defensive war. They who are opposed to the war may name it an offensive and foreign war, because it may be foreign to their desires and offensive to their dispositions, and so England may name it foreign and offensive, because foreign to her desires; she would rather have carried on war in disguise against the United States, and in that manner have subjected their rights, they remaining passive and unwilling even to be kicked into a war! The war is offensive to her, because the United States would not continue a submission to her monstrous aggressions and usurpations. In this sense, and no other, can the war be said to be foreign and offensive.

The object of just war is to compel the aggressor to do justice; and to attain that end he may be attacked by land and sea, and the injured nation has a right to choose the place of attack; either by land or sea, or both. It is not for the aggressing nation in such war to direct the injured nation where to attack; that would be to reverse the very design of the war. In this war the United States are advised to attack England on the ocean; and at the same time they are told that England is invulnerable on the ocean; that her thousand ships of war rule and give her the dominion of the ocean. England then being invulnerable on the ocean, to persuade to attack her on the ocean is what she, it is presumed, would, if she could, persuade the United States to do. For the United States to attack Great Britain on the ocean, to compel her, as the only mode to do justice to them, would be a strange scheme, apparently irreconcilable to common sense and common prudence. But it may be observed, with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that there is an audacity which sometimes stands men instead both of genius and strength; and most assuredly, he is most likely to perform that which no man ever did before, and will never be likely to do again, who has the boldness to undertake that, which no man ever thought of attempting in time past, and no man will ever think of attempting in time future. I would not, however, sir, be understood as intimating that England cannot be conquered on the ocean, for nations rise and fall like trees in the woods.

A nation not sufficiently strong to attack the usurper of its rights on the ocean, is justifiable in carrying the war into his territories and dominions, and the occupation of its territories by the injured nation will not be a reason to denominate the war an offensive war, for, even by the common law of England, (which will not be disputed,) he who commits the first act of aggression is answerable for all the consequences. In this debate, relative to the war, that maxim of England appears to be forgotten, and no wonder that maxim is forgotten, for all the injuries perpetrated against the United States, by her, appear to be forgotten. And that is strange, for, owing to something wrong in human nature, injuries are better and longer remembered than benefits; and what may seem to be stranger than that, is, that by reason of some other strange thing in human nature, both injuries and bene-

But it is objected that for the United States to occupy by their armies the territories of England in North America, is contrary to the laws of religion and morality. Certainly they who make the objection will in this case take and act agreeably to examples given by England, who can do no wrong. For instance, Scotland and Ireland were ancient kingdoms—some old books intimate, more ancient than England; and England overcame with her armies, and conquered both, with immense slaughter of mankind, and finally incorporated them with herself in one empire; and certainly England would do nothing contrary to the laws of religion or morality. But it is contrary to the laws of morality. By the common law of England, an assault will justify a battery; and certainly the common law of England, being the perfection of reason, is the perfection of morality. England has assaulted, nay, grievously battered the United States many, many times, more than three times. In this case, then, the example and law of England prove that to occupy the territories of usurping England is not contrary to morality nor to religion. Will the objector say, that he who suffers his household to be destroyed by an enemy, and will not provide for its safety, acts pursuant to religion? Besides, morality and religion both sanction self-preservation.

War may justifiably be carried on against an usurper, where he is vulnerable. Admit England is invulnerable on the ocean, but is vulnerable on land, and the United States are not able to fight her on the ocean, and are prohibited by the laws of morality and religion to attack her on her territory; they then may submit to all her aggressions patiently, like good religionists and moralists, and console themselves with inability in the one case, and religion and morality on the other. According to this doctrine, an army of Indians, allies of England, may come from beyond the limits of the United States, and murder hundreds of men, women, and children; and the United States are prohibited by religion and morality beyond their own limits to pursue the savage murderers. Away with all such impure and spurious doctrines. Let them be banished to the shades where dwell non-resistance and passive obedience.

Prejudice against England cannot with propriety be imputed to the United States. They patiently waited several years for the returning friendship of England; but friendship returned not; for their patience they received contumely, and more abuse; and were even told they could not be kicked into a war. The friendly disposition which dictated that saying, cannot be attributed to prejudice against England. The arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, and the whole conduct of the United States disprove the pretended idea of prejudice against England. That notion, and the notion of French influence, are of the same origin—mere creatures of the

It has been urged, that if the Orders in Council and blockade system were repealed by England, and if that had been known previous to the declaration of war, that declaration would not have been made. Admit that to be so, for the argument sake—that cannot have any force against the war. England had time sufficient to repeal them, if she had been so disposed, previous to the declaration of war; but she did not repeal them previous thereto. But, if she has repealed them, they were repealed in consequence of the oppression by them imposed on her own subjects, and not in consequence of an intention to do justice to the United States; for a repeal of them, intending justice to the United States, would have been a long time before it was made; and not limited and conditional, as it was, but absolute as respected the United States. In justice, the United States, being a neutral nation, were entitled to a complete exemption from the operation of all the maritime and commercial edicts, which they remonstrated against, and endeavored to obtain an exemption from, since the time of their commencement, notwithstanding the allegations of England, that she was compelled to adopt them in retaliation against her enemy. She and her enemy might have issued edicts against each other to infinity; the United States, in justice, ought not to have been made the subject of their operation, and more so as they had given no cause for their existence.

In this case it has been attempted to be assumed that, the Orders in Council being repealed, the cause of the war has ceased, and, therefore, the war ought to cease. This assumption assumes that the Orders in Council were the only cause of the war. What, then, and is the impressment and enslaving of more than six thousand American seamen no cause of war? But for the present, let the Orders in Council be taken as the cause of war, the conclusion will not follow. The Orders in Council existed at the time war was declared. Let the order pretending to be a repeal of the Orders in Council be attentively observed, through a pure perspective of American manufacture, that order will be discovered to be only a time-serving and make-believe pretension of what it is not. It is not what it pretends to be; for it is loaded with restrictions, limitations, and reserves. Too long has the American nation been amused with promises and pretences of friendship from a source where enmity appears rooted. Let England do justice, mere justice, and nothing more, and she may, when she pleases, put an end to the war. But no; such is not her will, for offers of impartial accommodation, ever since the declaration of war, were made to her, and she has rejected them; the documents manifesting the same are spread before the American people. War, on the part of England performs the operation of the Orders in Council, and more, and by a treaty only can be terminated. Let England, by acts of justice, show that she is willing to end the war and be at peace; let her restore the American seamen she has impressed, and indemnify for all the spoiliations she has committed, and for all the violations of the sovereignty of this nation, and she will find the United States cordially disposed to meet her on terms of mutual justice, and at the return of peace, said Mr. R., no one will be more gratified than I will be.

A gentleman from Massachusetts has amused himself with a long talk about this bill—sometimes to him it is mere smoke and phantom, at other times it appears arrayed in the terrific form of a Gorgon. That gentleman has had his fancy on the torture to discover what the design of the bill is—sometimes it is to invade Canada, then it is an electioneering trick. Alas, for truth, when buried in the bewildering of imagination! And yet the gentleman would induce a belief that he knows many things about it, for he talks profusely about something he calls a Cabinet, which, according to his talk, must know everything. A cabinet! And pray, sir, what is a cabinet? A man far off in the woods would suppose that word meant some sort of house, being a derivative from the word cabin, a name given to a house wherein a first settler of waste lands resides; so, then, there are the words cabin, cabinet, and cabinet-maker. Either of the terms may be taken, and the meaning given to convey an inapplicable idea for the purpose of understanding the minimums of fancy. A cabinet (small chest)—in England the word may mean king and privy council—in America, under the Constitution of the United States, the word has no meaning applicable to any department of the Government. Ah! but it is delicious to follow anything carrying the fume of Old England. The application of a little plain common sense will discover, without trouble, what the design of the bill is: For instance, the United States are at war in defence of their rights against the usurpations of England; war is to be carried on with forces; the bill contemplates the raising of forces—and the forces when raised are to act in maintenance of the rights of this nation, and where a direction shall be given; and anybody who knows the United States are at war may know all that without the aid of a sorites. The gentleman is opposed to the war, and of course a politician to whom the war is offensive, that is, he is opposed to the invasion of Canada—but Canada is a province of England, and near the United States, and a force of England is there, and the celebrated Henry, of British-Emissary-memory, came from there; and all this the gentleman knows, and much more, and, therefore, let him be excused for his opposition to an attack on Canada, for that is war against England, and England has done no injury to the United States.

In this debate it is urged, it is cruel and inhuman to invade the people of Canada; subsisting relations are stated between the people of the United States and the people of Canada. Relations doubtless exist; but the people of Canada are the subjects of England; but, passing that over, it ought to be known that no invasion will be made on the people of Canada, considered only as the people of Canada. All the round-about talk on that subject is inapplicable, unless they can make it appear that they are independent of England; in that case the United States will never invade them; they may if they will be so, but that they are not. In Canada are strong fortifications and regular troops of England, keeping the people of Canada mindful of their subjection. The safety of the United States may require the removal of the same regular troops from Canada—in that removal the people of Canada can lay neutral and no one will injure them. But the talk will not have all the praise expected without being puffed with terms expressing the cruelty of an invasion of Canada. This notion of the invasion of Canada, what a powerful notion it is! We are told that the success of the English Ministry at the late elections, was owing to this notion of the invasion of Canada; the English Ministry then ought to be grateful to those who propagated that notion, for as it has already, so it may with other means in the power of that Ministry, help them out at some other dead lift, and it follows that an opposition to that notion may incur the direful wrath of that Ministry, and what a dreadful thing that will be!

In this debate, about a bill to raise an additional number of regiments of infantry, the wonderful man, Napoleon, is dragged in to help—he is introduced, clothed in terrors, to defeat this bill; this bill, so unnecessary, so good for nothing, Fears are entertained lest the same terrific Napoleon, after having destroyed all other nations, shall take in his head to destroy the United States also; this is strange indeed, the fears entertained ought to operate in favor of the bill, and so one would think. But it seems the order of nature is reversed in these times of wonder, and what is most feared is not to be provided against. But why shall the terrible Napoleon be now an object of fear? Do not all the late accounts from Great Britain (and certainly nothing but truth can come from the fast-anchored Island!) go to show that the terrible Napoleon is, with all his armies, blocked up in the desolation of Moscow, and cannot escape? Away, then, with all idle fears of the terrible Napoleon—this is not the time to play off boyish buggaboo tricks. But it is intimated that the mighty Napoleon has destroyed all public law; well, then, he must have had, or has in his hands, the sovereignty of the ocean as well as of the dry land—and England on the ocean is subject to him. He who may will believe that; as soon will Great Britain be believed to be now swallowed down and engulfed in the ocean. How, when, where, and by whom was that thing, named public law, made and concluded? When and where did the nations convene and make it? When and where was it universally acted on? For, being a public law, it must have been publicly, that is, universally in force, obligatory and acted on; like the phantom named balance of power, the thing named public law has been a ladder used by ambition to mount the summit of despotism. England cried out balance of power, public law, and endeavored to justify all her maritime usurpations by it, until she mounted up to the dominion of the ocean; and now she says she has a right to that dominion, and of right will hold it, because her navy sweeps the ocean in all directions, and by the power of her navy she will hold it, and no doubt she will so long as she is able. In this, England has done no more than every other nation who acquired maritime ascendancy has done; that is, bottomed every maritime usurpation on that thing named public law, until the ascendancy was acquired, and then set public law at defiance, declaring that maritime power carried with it the right to prescribe maritime law. On that despotic principle each of them acted, until the injured surrounding nations put down the ascendancy. That usurpation, although in execution it has for a time suspended the rights of nations, bottomed on natural law and universal justice, has not obliterated those natural and inalienable rights. They being perpetual in existence, although overpowered for a time, continually operate, until at length they burst forth with irresistible energy and bury the usurper in an everlasting grave, under the ruins of his own magnificence.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in the fruitfulness of his imagination, has discovered another object of this bill; that is, that this bill, and even the war itself, is an electioneering trick, to have a Lieutenant General of the Armies appointed, who, by a future election, may become President of the United States; and that the State of Virginia is at the bottom of all this, because a citizen of that State must be the Lieutenant General; that, in twenty-eight years, the Presidency of the United States will have been administered twenty-four years by a Virginian, and intimating, that, not content with that, Virginia is looking forward to an election four years hence. This is a heavy charge against you, Virginia; and for this, the gentleman, in his big anger, has charged you with ambition, and a majority of the other States are covertly charged with abetting you in your ambition, as if they were influenced by you, or were not fit to judge for themselves; and all this by a gentleman from Boston. The gentleman will not remember past times; he will not recollect when, at the commencement of the Revolutionary war, Boston was filled with a devouring and cruel enemy, and the good people thereof in wretched misery; that then, when paleness of face prevailed in Boston, Virginia rose with magnanimity, greatness, and majesty; sent her beloved Washington, and her armed bands of citizens, and her rich provisions, to deliver and save the good people of Boston from their merciless enemies and from famine. The gentleman will not remember this, for great men sometimes forget their friends. Many good men, however, yet alive in Boston, remember it, and with gratitude. This, however, is not intended to intimate that a President of the United States ought always to be elected from Virginia, but only to show that the gentleman would do as well to be in good humor towards Virginia.

But the gentleman, it seems, has discovered that this bill, and even the war itself, is an electioneering scheme to make a citizen of Virginia President of the United States. Well, this is truly a wonderful discovery; completely novel, and of the gentleman's own invention; and as it may be of great use in the political world, the gentleman is entitled to all the benefits and emoluments of a first discovery; to obtain which adequate provision is made by law, so soon, as a model is lodged in the proper office.

Some observations were made by the gentleman relating to drawing-rooms. Such foul and undeserved aspersions have one only answer—"Let him who is filthy be filthy still."

A charge is made against this bill, that it will be injurious to the militia. That is impossible. An evident object of it is to preserve the militia within the limits of their respective States and Territories, as far as is consistent with safety to the Union, to the intent that the militia may be less frequently taken off from their rural and other occupations; and that, to the militia, is of the utmost importance; and it is well known how careful the Governors of some States are of the militia. But a certain operation which this bill will have, is completely kept out of view; that operation is, it may be presumed, what has thrown the gentleman so much off his guard. The operation alluded to is simply this: this bill, if it becomes a law, will give a force to the President of the United States, which will not be controlled by any novel constructions of the Constitution of the United States, and, in its operation, will greatly aid the President of the United States to carry on a just war against the usurpations of England, in defence of the sacred rights of the nation; this is the great stumbling block. All that that gentleman has said in this debate—taking into view his poetry also, which is an inimitable example of the true bathos—is reducible to a few points, namely, invective against those who administer the affairs of this nation; second, an attempt to persuade, not to invade Canada; third, an attempt, in a guarded but solicitous manner, to show the weakness of the physical and pecuniary resources of the United States to carry on the war; and fourth, a self-pleasing display of the greatness of the power and resources of England, and justification of England in her conduct against the United States, accompanied throughout the whole with modest intimations of the certainty of his knowledge, in relation to things by him declared to be true, on his own conscience, in a course of eight years, in which he intimates himself to have been an attentive observer of things and persons.

He has observed, and properly too, that "the strength of satire is the justness of the remark, and the only sting of invective is the truth of the observation." Let the impartial and unprejudiced read, contemplate, and understand the history of all the transactions on the part of the United States towards England, and on the part of England towards the United States; and, also, all the mass of invective which that gentleman has, in the course of his debates, and for nearly eight years, been endeavoring to throw on those who have administered the affairs of this nation; and then apply the test given by himself, and it will appear that he has been in the habit, not only in this debate, but at other times, of pronouncing invective against himself; and, for a plain reason, his invective in relation to those who administer the affairs of this nation, is without the sting necessary to make it invective; and where there is no invective there is no satire.

H. OF R.

So much of what he has observed in opposition to an invasion of Canada, has been already noticed. So much as respects the inability of the United States to carry on the war by invading Canada, or otherwise, will recoil, on application of the rule, if designed as invective against this nation. And so much thereof as goes to display the power and resources of England, and the statements in relation to the conduct of England towards the United States, will, for the present, be left to be explained by the gentleman himself at another time.

The gentleman has stated that his ancestors have been planted in this country for near two centuries. And what will that prove? Only that his ancestors, for so much of that period as was previous to the declaration of independence, were subjects of England, as were all others who were in existence in the then colonies of England at the time of that declaration. That circumstance will not sanction the abuse of those who administer the affairs of this nation. The gentleman intimates that he has character and friends, and a deep stake in the soil. And is he the only one standing in that predicament? Have not they who administer the affairs of this nation characters, families, and friends, and deep stakes in the soil, also? Are not they, and every one who is engaged in resisting the aggressions and usurpations of England, as deeply interested in the safety and welfare of the Republic, as that gentleman who once thought the United States could not be kicked into a war. Patriotism and love of country does not depend on a long ancestral residence in that country, nor in a deep stake in the soil. Several men, whose ancestors had for many years been settled in the country previous to the declaration of independence of the United States, did not remain in the United States, but chose to continue subjects of England. At that period every man had a right to elect whether he would continue a subject of England and retire, or remain and help to resist the then usurpations of England, and the establishment of that declaration of independence. The contentions and discord of the Jews, shut up in the city of Jerusalem, by the Roman legions under Titus Vespasian, were a cause of the delivery of that great city into the hands of Titus, and the destruction of it and the Jewish nation; and these very Jews were the offspring of a long line of ancestry, who had been for many centuries in possession of that city and Judea, and rooted in that soil as deeply and exclusively as the oak or lofty cedar that rooted itself among the rocks of Lebanon, and even as deeply as the gentleman himself in the soil of Massachusetts. This case is only noticed to show that a long line of ancestry is not the exclusive cause of patriotism, without believing that the opposition of the gentleman to the bill under consideration, although it may and probably will be a cause of prolonging the war, will have any effect whatever towards subjecting the United States to the usurpations of England. As has been observed, England commenced, at an early period of the United States, her operation of war in disguise against them; and in that England was resisted by negotiation under the Administration of President WASHINGTON, the father and friend of his country, and by every succeeding President of the United States, and that is the highest authority to have continued resistance, not only by negotiation, but by war itself, until the object is obtained. To that war in disguise, the embargo and non-intercourse laws were opposed, under expectation that thereby England might be induced to stop her war in disguise, and do justice to the United States. The embargo and non-intercourse laws were resisted, and failed in effect, and, by that resistance, England was encouraged to progress in her war in disguise, and that war at last produced a declaration of war against England; that declaration of war was opposed, and so also has every measure to carry on the war. And there is every reason to believe that that opposition, in its several periods, has had considerable influence on England to continue her war in disguise, and will operate on her to continue the war, notwithstanding the efforts of those who, by every means, without war, endeavored to obtain justice from England in an amicable manner, and who now, by war, are endeavoring to obtain that object.

MR. WIDGERY.—MR. SPEAKER: I understand the question before the House to be on the bill for raising twenty thousand troops, in addition to those already raised. To this bill the objections are, that it is an unjustifiable war; that there was no need of war; that England has always been ready to do us justice, and to give us peace on honorable terms; that her Orders in Council which were the great cause of war, were revoked; that England wants none but her own seamen, and that she was willing to negotiate about the seamen when ready, but that she was not quite ready; that the Cabinet was made up of two Virginians and a foreigner; that the war was declared with a view to secure the election of James the First; that it was intended to give James the Second the command of the army, in order to secure his election as our next President; that it would augment the office-seekers, who, with the friends of the Administration, were continually haunting the Executive, like toads, that lived on the spittle of the palace and levee; that Mr. Monroe had been the instigator of the letter written by Mr. Cushing, in which a Lieutenant General was hinted at, and in proof of this last charge, they charged him with undertaking to arrange the War Office, which it was said, last session, would require the talents and abilities of three men; that Canada is of more use to us in the possession of the English, than if it was our own; because it now operated as a pledge for their good behaviour. Sir, if I believed one-half that has been said against my own Government, and in favor of the British Government, it would not only be my duty to vote against this bill, but to aid in repealing all the war measures. Sir, if what the gentlemen in the opposition have said, is true, it would be unpardonable in me to aid in any act, by which any of those sainted subjects in Canada, whom the gentlemen are pleased to call our friends and kinsmen, should be injured. Although I do not see how it is possible all those objections can apply to the question before the House, whatever they might have done against a declaration of war; yet, as gentlemen have been permitted to take this wide range in opposition to the bill, it is impossible they should be answered, without, in some measure, going from the question immediately under the consideration of the House. The opposition has been more of a rant than an argument. "That it is an unjustifiable war." If they are right in this, the majority must have been very wrong, in declaring war, in the first place; if that part of their objection is well founded, we must have been deceived in the whole of what we have understood to be the conduct of Great Britain towards the United States.

Sir, as early as 1793, Great Britain had beheld with a jealous eye, the great increase of the American commerce, carried on by an industrious, honest, and enterprising people; she knew not for some time how to curtail it, without an open rupture; at last she dreamed that corn was contraband of war, and in spite of all that could be said or done by our Minister, then at the Court of London, she insisted on this abuse of power to prevent the United States from exporting her own corn to any of the belligerents (herself excepted.) This, however, did not prevent entirely the growth of the American commerce. Eight or ten years after this, another deep laid plot was set on foot. Some of the Americans were taken. On the trial of one of these vessels, Sir William Scott gave an opinion, that produce taken direct from the colonies to a neutral port, there discharged and reshipped, was a sufficient proof of its neutralization, to carry it to any part of the world. This gave a spring to the American commerce; the ocean was whitened with her canvass in every climate; rich and full cargoes passing in every direction; the owners innocent and unsuspecting as the lamb that licks the salt from the butcher's hand—mark their fate. England now, for the first time, decreed that neutrals had no right in war which peace did not give them. She immediately sent forth her cruisers; her avarice, paramount to every other consideration, could not be restrained; contrary to the law of nations, of reason and common honesty, she made one general sweep. When the vessels and cargoes were carried into London, Sir William Scott had his excuses ready. In vain did the defendants urge his former decision; he said it was true that he had given such an opinion, but it had been overruled by higher authority, and by whose opinion he was bound. No further reasoning was had on the subject. The Americans were brought in like sheep to the slaughter, condemned, their property taken from them; they left to wander about the streets, penniless, depending on the cold hand of charity for subsistence. In this, sir, I challenge contradiction. I was in London at the time, and had the mortification to see my countrymen stripped of their all, and thus turned adrift, in a foreign land. Her voracious appetite not yet satisfied, her paper blockade was next put in force. With a single paragraph from her pen, she put the whole frontier of Europe under a state of blockade, without a single ship in sight of one-half the harbors; and in consequence of which, the British ships of war came over to your country, three thousand miles from the places blockaded, there captured your ships in the mouth of your harbors, and within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the United States, contrary to every principle of the law of nations, which considers only such ports under blockade as have a sufficient force before them, to prevent neutrals entering the port. All this has been done to injure and destroy the American commerce. Are these not just causes of complaint, without mentioning the base practice of man-stealing, which is of itself a sufficient cause of war against England? As to the revocation of the Orders in Council, with the reserve made therein to restore them whenever it should be for the interest of the British Government; this is not what we are contending for—a mere momentary repeal; we dispute the right of any nation to make paper blockades. Instead, therefore, of gaining a point by this conditional repeal, if accepted on our part, it would be a tacit acknowledgment of their right to such blockade in future. Such a system could never be submitted to by any commercial nation, if in their power to prevent it. "England is ready to do us justice, and to enter into negotiations respecting our seamen." When will this "bulwark" of religion be ready to do us justice? We have called on her by every means in our power for fifteen years past, and she has, in every instance, evaded doing us justice, except in that of the Chesapeake. Gentlemen in the opposition, when talking about impressment, endeavor to balance the account by augmenting the number of English seamen in our merchant service. They have as many Americans in their merchant service, as we have of theirs in our service. But this is not what we complain of: it is the abominable practice of men-stealing, and compelling them to fight against their country, their brothers, fathers, and friends. This is what we are called on to oppose—the enslaving our citizens, and carrying them from their friends and their families. Is it such a crime to look like an Englishman, and to talk the same language, that we must be enslaved for it wherever they can take us? It cannot be submitted to. But the Cabinet is composed of "two Virginians and a foreigner." As to the President, it matters not with me, on what particular spot of ground he was born, if, within the United States—if he is the best man, take him. He will not be so likely to bear against "New England," in a Middle State, as if he was further South, or from Tennessee or from Kentucky. If, therefore, one State must have the Presidents, I think them in less danger in a Middle State, than in any of the extremes. Sir, I have heard so much against those Virginians, that I had almost concluded they were devils; but when I came among them, I found them acting in politics according to their talents and abilities, very much like other men. But what shall be done with Mr. Monroe? He, they say, was the instigator of Mr. Cushing's letter, in which a Lieutenant General was hinted at. Sir, I see nothing in this letter more extraordinary than what might have been expected from any military officer, and what is to be seen in all large armies. But to prove their fears are well grounded, they charge him with going into the War Office to do the work, which, it was said last session, would require the labor of three men. This is monstrous! A Virginian charged with the crime of industry! A man undertaking to do three men's work himself! Of all places in the world, Virginia would be the last in which I should think of charging the citizens with the crime of industry! It might apply much better further north. But Mr. Monroe seems to be to the opposition, what Mordecai was to Haman. Sir, I remember when in London, amidst all the distress of his fellow-citizens who were captured and brought in to that place, they all spoke well of him as a faithful servant of his country. Sir, I find him at home equally busy in the service of his country, in season and out of season—regardless of his own ease, always ready to attend to business. Sir, this violent opposition to such a character from that quarter of the House, raises him in my estimation.

But what is to be done with the foreigner? "Two Virginians and a foreigner." Sir, Mr. Gallatin was in this country during our struggle for liberty: He was at that time professor of the French language in Cambridge college. His citizenship is as old as your nation. As well might you call all who were here antecedent to the Revolution foreigners. I know of no legal distinction between the subjects of Great Britain who are born on the island of Britain, and those born in her colonies. While they belong to that nation, they have like passions and national prejudices. We never heard the complaint of foreigner against Mr. Hamilton, when he was Secretary of the Treasury. He was as much a foreigner as Mr. Gallatin. Mr. Hamilton was born on the island of Jamaica. The Federal gentlemen were never alarmed about this English foreigner. When he died, funeral processions were made all over the country on his account. No Republicans cried out foreigner; they considered him a citizen of the United States. If Mr. Gallatin was not uncommonly guarded, correct, and fair in all his dealings, he would have been found out before now. He has had so many enemies continually watching for his halting, that I have no doubt, had he committed errors, the Federal gentlemen would have detected him before this time. Sir, I do not stand here as the advocate of Mr. Gallatin, more than of any other man, who is thus attacked unfairly, and where he has no chance to answer for himself.

"That this war was declared with a view to secure the election of James the First." How strangely do men contradict themselves when driven to desperate shifts. This very gentleman, my colleague, (Mr. QUINCY,) in the same speech, declares that the war is unpopular, that the greatest part of the citizens were opposed to it, and that those who acquiesced in it did it with the greatest reluctance. How then it could aid the election of Mr. Madison must be elucidated by Federal logic. "James the Second is to have the command of the Army, to aid his election as President for the next four years." Strange objection to a bill for an enlistment of twelve months—that it is to aid an election which is to take place four years hence. This is hardly deserving of an answer. But my colleague (Mr. QUINCY) says it will augment the office-seekers, who, with the friends of the Administration, haunt the palace, like toads, that live on the spit-tle of the palace and the levee. If the gentleman means partaking at the President's bounteous table, he too has taken his turn. He has enjoyed the fruits of the palace, and touched the generous glass at levee. (How black the sin of ingratitude!) The House will pardon me for repeating the gentleman's language in his simile of the toad; language which, if used in any place except on the floor of Congress Hall, I should have considered as Billingsgate. Many of the gentleman's political friends, who have sought and obtained offices under the late appointments, will not feel under obligations to him for his simile. "That Canada is of more use to us in the possession of the British than if it was our own." Sir, so long as we have the English in our neighborhood, so long will our Government be disturbed by secret machinations. She is so handy that she will always be able to do more by stratagem towards dividing our councils and the Union, than all her armies could do, had she no colonies on the continent. Aside from her red allies, whom she can set to war with us just when she pleases, consider them in any point of view you please, they are dangerous neighbors. I would not be understood by these remarks to mean that I would not settle with England until we had conquered the Canadas, but to show that they are a dangerous pledge to us; they have always looked on the United States as their own, and have only sought for a good opportunity to divide them, in order that they might take possession; hence the Henry plot, the discovery of which will, for a time, put them back. Sir, whenever a country is to be revolutionized, the leaders who are intrusted with the secret are always to come forward as the friends of the people and peace-makers, who are ready to give up all for the good of the people; tell them how cruel their Government is; that their rulers have no feelings for them; that they only aim to enslave them; that if they had the rule they would soon relieve them, &c. Thus they deceive the people, until they get into power themselves, and then, for the first time, the people find they never meant them for anything but hewers of wood and drawers of water. It is by those deceptive measures that most of the Governments in Europe have been overthrown. Look at the situation of this country; the peace-makers crying out against the President, with an united voice, from one end of the continent to the other, that he is under French influence—that he is a war man, &c. When the fact is, that this mighty war man has almost prostrated the honor of his country at the foot of Britain in search of peace. My colleague (Mr. BRIGHAM) when up yesterday, acknowledged that if united we could conquer Canada, and if united we could have an honorable peace; but, said the gentleman, "Mr. Speaker, you differ in opinion as much from me as I do from you." Sir, if I have understood you, both in private and public, you have on a full investigation of the dispute between the two nations, formed an opinion in favor of your own Government, and against the enemies of your country; what is the reverse of this opinion I leave to the gentleman's own reflection. Why, then, not unite and have peace? Is it not our duty to use every exertion in our power to obtain an honorable peace, or are gentlemen determined to use every means in their power to prevent anything being done, unless they can compel the majority to give up to the minority? Sir, we meet here to consult what is best to be done for the nation, and to support whatever the majority shall agree on; and are we now to be told by individuals in the minority, that they will not aid or assist in carrying on the war, after it has been decreed by a large majority of the House? Are gentlemen determined not to unite in any one thing, unless they can do as they please? Sir, it is said the devil would be good natured let him have his own way. I am willing the majority should rule, and whatever they agree to I will support; I know of no other way to get along with a republican form of government. When the gentlemen were telling you how cruel it was to meddle with the British subjects in Canada, they were very careful not to speak of the scalping knife, so dexterously used on our defenceless citizens. No, sir, their tender passions were never disturbed on account of those savage barbarities; this was not their business, it is too much to think of. I have heard not a single argument from the gentlemen in the minority, which does not go to tame submission and non-resistance to the military encroachments of Great Britain.

Sir, I would ask the gentlemen what has been the cause of this mighty change in their minds? Not long since, they petitioned the Government from one end of the continent to the other to resist Great Britain, and protect them in their commercial pursuits; no satisfaction made for the captures of that day; no agreement entered into between us and Great Britain not to steal our seamen; yet, strange to tell, those gentlemen who then offered to pledge their lives and fortunes, are now the champions in support of England, and the most bitter revilers of our own Government.

Sir, as to the bill before the House it is not such as entirely meets my ideas. I wished the enlistments had been for at least eighteen months, but as the majority of the House were of a different opinion, I had rather take the bill as it is, than not to augment the Army for the next campaign, and shall therefore give my vote in the affirmative.

Mr. ARCHER said, so great was the respect which he felt for the House, so deep was the consciousness which he entertained of his inability to do justice to a cause, especially one of so much magnitude and importance, of which he might be the advocate, that he would be doing injustice to his feelings were he not to express the weight of the embarrassments which oppressed him. But the wide range which the present discussion had taken, involving considerations of great national interest, and calling forth the cruel asperities of political intolerance, seemed to leave him no alternative in the discharge of his duty, but to repel the unfounded insinuations which had flown in so copious a stream from the other side of the House. Were gentlemen to confine themselves to a temperate investigation of the propriety of adopting measures either recommended by the Executive, or proposed by the majority, who is there that would not listen with pleasure and satisfaction? But when the liberty of debate was prostituted in disseminating the most unfounded charges, in the indiscriminate abuse of the constituted authorities of the nation, he confessed, he could not "always be a hearer, and never reply." The few observations he had to make would be without either system or arrangement, having bestowed no previous consideration on the subject, and should be confined not so much to the bill for raising an additional army, as the remarks and arguments of those gentlemen who had preceded him on the other side of the House.

And here, he said, he hoped to be permitted first to notice the charge which had been confidently made by a gentleman from New York (Mr. GOLD) against the majority of the House, He had asserted (and he seemed to dwell upon the assertion with peculiar satisfaction) that war had been declared by Congress prematurely and without due preparation; that to embark in a war with a powerful nation, without a large standing army, was impolitic in the extreme. This principle, said Mr. A., in the general might be true, but it had certainly no application to this country. Our Government was founded on the broad basis of popular opinion, liable to fluctuation upon the first appearance of any system which might be calculated to destroy the liberties of the people. A laudable jealousy of their rulers throbbed in the heart of every man in the country, who would seize the first opportunity to change an Administration that would raise a standing army in time of peace, whatever might be the professed objects of such an Administration. From this jealousy the natural result would be, that the men who raised the army would never declare the war which it was intended to wage. He would refer to the Administration of Mr. Adams. An army had been then raised, or attempted to be raised, to defend the country against an anticipated French invasion. The professed object was disbelieved, and the people, apprehending an invasion of their rights, removed from power the men who had voted for the army. All our institutions were repugnant to a standing army in time of peace. Anticipated invasion would seldom justify it, because it might be made a pretext for the purpose at all times, and with the most dangerous views. What had been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) seemed to confirm this position, for he had expressed his fears of the army, even in a state of declared war, when that army was to be employed out of the limits of the country; and if jealousy existed at such time, the conclusion would naturally follow, that it would exist to a greater degree in a time of peace. The argument then of the gentleman, if it proved anything, proved too much, because its effect would always be to frustrate the views of the Government, and prevent it from going to war to avenge even the grossest insult, or to assert even its most indisputable rights. But an appeal had been made with much confidence to the history of all Europe, to bear him out in the charge he had made, and it had been said, that no instance of a nation's engaging in a war without having a well regulated and disciplined army could be adduced. This, said Mr. A., will be admitted, but he presumed it was incumbent upon the gentleman to show that some analogy existed between the Governments of Europe and that of the United States, before his argument could have any application to the subject. There the people had no voice in the selection of their rulers. There the arbitrary will of the monarch was the law of the land, and his decrees, however oppressive or obnoxious, were enforced by the hand of power, without a murmur or complaint. There each Government is surrounded by kingdoms powerful and strong, the ambition of whose rulers prompts them to seize upon every occasion to enlarge the boundaries of their dominions. For one of these Powers, even in the most peaceful condition of the world, to be destitute of a powerful and permanent military force, would evince an inattention to its own security and independence, which would demonstrate the incapacity of its monarch to govern his subjects, or to preserve the integrity of his possessions. But the dissimilarity of the Government and situation of the United States, would show the inapplicability of the gentleman's maxim to this country. Here we have no powerful neighbor whose incursions we dread. Here we are happily removed by a wide extended ocean from those nations, who, upon a declaration of war by us, could overrun the country with a military force, or endanger its civil institutions. Here we have a people proudly jealous of their liberties, who will put down constitutionally every attempt in a state of peace to raise a Military Establishment. To have delayed, then, the declaration of war against England, until the ranks of the army authorized to be raised had been completely filled, would have been a most certain course to have defeated the object which Congress had in view. The jealousies and fears which would have been the necessary consequence of such delay, would have brought into power men of far different views; men who, if the natural conclusion to be drawn from the arguments of some of them could be admitted, would sooner submit to all the indignities we had received from Great Britain, than resist her. The war was therefore not declared prematurely, but was delayed to as late a period as the nature of our institutions would permit. And, if what he had said would not be sufficient to satisfy the gentleman from New York of his error, the army that was so shamefully surrendered at Detroit, if it had been commanded by a man of spirit and fidelity, would long before this, by the possession which it would have given us of an important province of the enemy, have convinced him that war was not declared without preparation. But, for having said so much upon this point, some apology seemed to be necessary upon his part, and he could only say that he had been induced to do so, because, having been one of the majority who voted for war against England, the charge seemed to be an imputation against his character, which the duty every man owed to himself bound him to repel.

It had been said, by a gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN,) that the nature of the war had been changed; the principal cause had been removed by the British Order in Council of June 23d, 1812, by which her previous orders were repealed; that it was a well-ascertained fact that war would not have taken place if this intelligence had reached the United States before its declaration; and that the Executive ought to have acceded to the terms, proposed through Admiral Warren, and have terminated the contest. These were grounds which demanded some consideration, and he trusted that he would be able to show, from authentic documents, that his premises were erroneous, and that of course his conclusions did not follow. But he would now admit, for the sake of argument, (what he should hereafter prove incorrect,) that the Orders in Council were the principal cause of the war; he could not, for himself, see how, even then, the war ought in justice to have terminated. Did it follow that minor considerations should be placed out of view or yielded up entirely? Would it have been proper for the Government to have entered into no stipulations for the security of American seamen? Would it have been proper in them, to have claimed on behalf of our citizens no indemnity for the vast amount of spoliations which have been made on the property of American merchants? Unquestionably not. Until these considerations, admitting them to be of minor importance, should have been satisfactorily adjusted, to have made a peace, in his opinion, would have been the height of impolicy. Sir, said he, it is not sufficient that the injury should cease, but that ample compensation should be made for the commission of the wrong. This was the case every day between individuals in civil society, and why ought not the rule to apply with equal force to States, in their relation to each other? Justice was its foundation, and that would operate upon the one as well as the other. These considerations alone, perhaps, ought to be deemed sufficient to show that the course the gentlemen would have taken would have been unwise. But, supposing them to have no weight, he thought it might be satisfactorily shown that, to have acceded to the terms proposed by the British Government, would have been an actual abandonment of the principal cause which had induced hostilities. To have negotiated without entering into an arrangement in relation to the important interest of impressment would unquestionably have been a relinquishment of the right which we claimed, to be exempted from its exercise. But it was said that was a secondary consideration. From whence was this conclusion drawn? Were we more regardful of the property than the personal liberty of the citizen? Was it taken from an impression which had gone abroad in the country? or from the unofficial conversation of the members of the House? These opinions (if the expression were allowed) he would call extra judicial, and entitled to no consideration. But to show that impressment was the principal cause, he would resort to the best evidence of which the case was susceptible. He would appeal to the archives and records of the country, which in his opinion, would be conclusive, to show what the opinions of Congress were upon that subject. And, in the first place, would call the attention of the House to the report of the committee to whom our foreign affairs were intrusted, which was made on the 29th of November, 1811. After commenting on the operation of the Orders in Council, they say:

"That they are not of that sect whose worship is at the shrine of a calculating avarice, and while they are laying before the House the just complaints of our merchants against the plunder of their ships and cargoes, they cannot refrain from presenting to the justice and humanity of their country, the unhappy case of our impressed seamen. Although the groans of these victims of barbarity for the loss of (what would be dearer to Americans than life) their liberty; although the cries of their wives and children in the privation of protectors and parents, have of late been drowned in the louder clamors at the loss of property; yet is the practice of forcing our mariners into the British navy in violation of the rights of our flag, carried on with unabated rigor and severity. If it be our duty to encourage the fair and legitimate commerce of the country by protecting the property of the merchant; then, indeed, by as much as life and liberty are more estimable than ships and goods, so much more impressive is the duty to shield the persons of our seamen, whose hard and honest services are employed, equally with those of the merchants, in advancing, under the mantle of its laws, the interests of their country."

Again, the same committee, in the report which they made to the House, detailing the causes which should induce the House to declare war, say, (after speaking of the evils flowing from the Orders in Council:)

"That they will proceed to the consideration of another wrong, which has been still more severely felt. This is the impressment of our seamen, a practice which has been unceasingly maintained by Great Britain in the wars to which she has been a party since our Revolution. That they cannot convey, in adequate terms, the deep sense which they entertain of the injustice and oppression of this proceeding. Under the pretext of impressing British seamen, Americans were seized in British ports, on the high seas, and in every other quarter to which the British power extends, were taken on board British men of war, and compelled to serve there as British subjects. In this mode our citizens were wantonly snatched from their own country and their families; deprived of their liberty, and doomed to an ignominious and slavish bondage; compelled to fight the battles of a foreign country, and often to perish in them. Our flag has given them no protection; it has been unceasingly violated, and our vessels exposed to danger by the loss of the men taken from them. That while this practice is continued, it is impossible for the United States to consider themselves an independent nation, for every case produces a new proof of their degradation."

These reports, by the adoption of the measures they recommended, were sanctioned by the Congress of the United States, and may be considered as furnishing strong, if not full and complete evidence, that the Legislative department of the Government considered the impressment of our seamen as the principal cause which impelled them to have recourse to the last resort of injured nations. The opinion of the Executive had been manifested in clear and explicit terms upon the subject, in the Message of the Chief Magistrate of the 1st of June, 1812. Thus we have these concurrent proofs against the assertions of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PITKIN.) If, then, as it appears clearly to have been, from the documents before alluded to, that impressment was the principal cause of the war, that it was an injury which no independent nation could submit to, without surrendering a portion of its sovereignty; would it not be admitted, even on the ground which had been taken, that, to have terminated the war, by acceding to the propositions alluded to, would have been degrading to the nation, and have manifested the incompetency of the Executive to have conducted with firmness the helm of State which had been submitted to his guidance and direction? And no doubt could be entertained had such an event taken place, but we should have heard denunciations against the Administration proceeding from the very quarter whence they now flow. Then they would have been made with infinitely more justice, because they would have been supported by reason and by truth. We should have then found the opposition appealing to the sympathies of the people, and proclaiming that their most inestimable rights had been surrendered by Government in the pacification; that although they were originally opposed to a war, when it had once been declared they would have prosecuted it until the claim had been abandoned by the British Government. For, it cannot be concealed that unless, in the present contest, Great Britain can be compelled to relinquish her claim to the right of impressment, unless it be made the sine qua non by the American Government, to any arrangement of the existing differences between the two nations, our claim to exemption from the practice must be forever given up, and Great Britain will feel herself at liberty to continue to exercise it with ten-fold rigor and severity.

No language was sufficiently strong to express the astonishment with which he listened to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) on yesterday. It was impossible for him to give utterance to those feelings of abhorrence and indignation which were excited in his breast by the observations which fell from that honorable member. Born and educated in a part of the country where even to think of a separation of the States was almost a treason against that country, little did he dream of hearing, in the American Congress, sentiments uttered which might effectually lead to so disastrous and deplorable an event. And he was the more astonished when these doctrines were attempted to be strengthened with menaces, and glossed with the colorings of wit and satire. He enjoyed, however, some consolation from knowing that

When the honorable member took his seat, he felt an instinctive impulse to rise and vindicate his character from the aspersions he had so wantonly cast upon it; but a night’s reflection had convinced him that either nature had not given him sufficient ingenuity to wipe them from it, or that they were unsusceptible of vindication. When the pen of the faithful historian should record the tragic events which might sooner or later take place in this country, when posterity should weep over the ruins of the Republic, and lament the blood of those freemen who should have supported with their lives its Constitution and its liberties, they could not fail to trace its cause to the true and original source. That honorable fame which his talents were so well calculated to earn, would be prostrated; his memory would live, but it would have an immortality which no man would envy, and instead of “convincing his descendants that he did not deserve the chains attempted to be fastened upon him,” he might at least give them reason to suspect that he was unworthy of enjoying those liberties his fathers had purchased for him. He had come to the House to-day to conjure the honorable member from Massachusetts, as he valued his reputation, as he prized his honorable fame, as he participated in the honor of his country, to suppress his speech, or to prevent it from meeting the animadversion of the public eye, at least in the shape in which it was delivered. And he called upon him by these considerations, before it was too late, to arrest its progress to the public observation and the public remark. But he feared that the wishes of so humble and inconsiderable a member of the House could have no influence over the leader of a party. He warned him to be cautious, lest he might fall the first victim of those flames which it seemed to be his object to enkindle in the Eastern section of this Union. He advised him to beware, lest he should raise a storm in the country, which it would be beyond the reach of his power to allay, when, perhaps, he most of all might desire it. It would be in such a season that he would have nothing left but the sad consolation to deplore the madness or delusion which could have dictated such conduct.

He understood, Mr. A. said, the gentleman to insinuate that a French influence had fastened itself upon the country. He would disdain to enter into any reasoning to show the absurdity of such an insinuation, which was as groundless as it was wicked. Nor would he deem it necessary, in the vindication of his character against the charge of such an influence, to retort upon that gentleman the charge of a contrary influence, because he would consider it a disgrace and dishonor to the country even to suspect that a single individual could be found who, having first drawn his breath within the limits of the United States, would be base enough to cherish an influence either French or British. He was, therefore, perfectly willing to declare that he did not believe the honorable member from Massachusetts was under British influence. But the gentleman seemed to anticipate a charge of that kind being made against him by the public presses, and, in prospective, declared that he should wholly disregard it. He hoped he might be permitted to say that, if the newspapers should attack him in the manner he had anticipated, he ought to remember that the cause of the attack would lie at his own door, and the speech which he had delivered would form an ample commentary on the charge. Although willing to exonerate him from all British influence and attachment, he could not but believe that he was secretly advocating, and insidiously endeavoring to effect, a disunion of the States. This seemed to be evinced, from the conduct which he had invariably pursued, since he had been a member of the House. What had been the nature of all his speeches? They had been entirely sectional. Had he not often attempted to show that the interests of a particular section of the Union had been prostrated before the overgrown power of another? Had he not, on yesterday, insinuated that a single State was usurping to itself the power of governing the Confederacy? Had he not, upon a former and a more memorable occasion, (memorable alone from the extraordinary sentiments he then delivered,) pronounced it as his deliberate opinion, “that the bonds of the Union were virtually dissolved, and that it was the duty of some of the States to separate, amicably if they could, forcibly if they must?” Had he not described the present condition of the country as full of gloom and darkness, and hinted at the dawn of a day which was to succeed? Had he not, in the fictions of a too fertile imagination, fancied himself yoked with a slave to the car of some Southern despot, and did he not say that he would prove to his children that he was unworthy of such an ignominious bondage? Could the honorable member from Massachusetts possibly wish to find verified the prediction of the infamous Henry, and his still more wicked employers, "that, if ever the Congress should possess spirit and independence enough to put their popularity in jeopardy by so strong a measure as war, the Federal States would erect a separate government for their common defence and common interest?" For what purpose was he sowing the seeds of a deep-rooted jealousy between the States, and endeavoring to rear them to a destructive maturity? It could be accounted for in no other way, in his estimation, when equal justice had been dealt out impartially to all, by the General Government, than by believing what, under other circumstances, it would have given him pain even to suspect, that the honorable member was friendly to a dissolution of those bonds, which connect us together. For the expression of his opinions, he hoped to be pardoned. Facts spoke for themselves, and the conclusion, to his mind, seemed to be irresistible. Notwithstanding all these things, the honorable member had professed to be a disciple of WASHINGTON! If a deviation from the maxims of a preceptor constituted the definition of a disciple, he knew not what a disciple was. He should believe, rather, that he was endeavoring to establish a political sect of his own, on the ruins of Washington's principles. He would earnestly advise him to read (for, if he ever read, he seemed to have forgotten them) the parting admonitions of that illustrious man. Let him have the sentiments contained in his farewell address imprinted on his heart in characters which could never be effaced; let his practice strictly conform to those precepts; let him unsay what he had said; then, and not until then, would he be entitled to the honorable appellation of a disciple of Washington.

If ever this Government should be destroyed, if ever this Union should be dissolved, it would be effected by leading and influential men obtaining elevated seats in the Councils of the nation; professing a sacred attachment to the Constitution of the country, and railing and declaiming at its violation, in all cases, even where ingenuity itself could scarcely torture the acts denounced into an infraction of the most general principle of that instrument. A general distrust excited, a groundless alarm sounded, is not easily removed or hushed into silence. It heightens the perturbation of the public mind, which, in such a feverish state, but too often proceeds to acts, without reflecting on consequences. Against such men, it behooved us to be on our guard, and we had been instructed by a man, whose instructions ought to be imperative, "to frown indignantly upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

The honorable member seemed to triumph over the defeats of his country! Even the toad, "that feeds upon the gloomy vapor of a dungeon," felt some sympathy for its wretched habitation; but the honorable member, enjoying the blessings of a free Government, had no tears to shed for the misfortunes and disasters of his country. What was generally considered disgraceful to the nation, was looked upon by him as "glory." A war, righteous and just, was represented as "immoral, wanton, and cruel." Everything in the moral as well as political world, were attempted to be perverted. Virtue was made to mean vice; a love of country, treachery to its interests; an appeal to the sword, in vindication of our rights, as a virtual abandonment of them—war against one nation, and submission to another.

If, in the present situation of the country, he were called upon to define the duty of a good citizen, he would say that he ought to yield a perfect obedience to the laws; that he ought to further all measures for the promotion of the general welfare; that he ought to aid in the prosecution of the present war, in order that a speedy and honorable peace might be obtained; that, instead of denouncing the measures of his own Government as "weak and wicked," he should vindicate them whensoever, and by whomsoever, assailed; that, instead of furnishing fuel to a jealousy of one part of the nation against the other, he should endeavor to extinguish it, and to promote union and harmony among all its parts. What the reverse of this picture was, it did not become him to say, but would leave it to those whose conduct and character that reversed picture fitted to determine.

All the rays of light which emanated from the mind of the honorable member from Massachusetts, seemed to fall into the dense medium of party spirit, and to be refracted from their proper course. Hence, he could not discover a single act of the Administration which met his views of national policy. Hence, he had declared that this Government, in its negotiations with Great Britain, never wished to arrange the differences which existed. Is it possible that this can be believed? Is it possible that the gentleman himself could believe it? Have not the Executive, during the two last Administrations, in every act, manifested the utmost anxiety upon the subject? An impartial history of the numerous wrongs of England against this country, will exhibit in the American Government an example of patient forbearance, which the annals of no other country can furnish. Had an opportunity been anxiously sought for, to involve us in a war with England, the attack on the Chesapeake would have furnished an excellent pretext. The popular spirit and indignation was aroused. Had Congress been convened immediately after that event, partaking of the general sensibility, war would have been the consequence. But, anxious to avoid hostilities, every means in the power of Government were resorted to, to preserve peace. Had we not, for nearly five years, been groaning under the operations of the Orders in Council?

H. OF R.

Had not Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney been instructed to propose such terms to the British Government on the subject of impressment as would have effectually secured her deserting seamen from being employed in our vessels? This proposition was not acceded to. And, after the treaty which they concluded in 1806 had been rejected by the President, a proposition was made by our Ministers which, with a very slight shade of difference, was the same offered by our Chargé des Affaires at London, subsequent to the declaration of war. Had not the present President of the United States promptly acceded to Mr. Erskine's arrangement? And had the gentleman forgotten the resolution introduced by himself, to return to the President the thanks of the House of Representatives for the promptitude with which he had acted in that affair? Had not the embargo and non-importation laws, of which the gentleman had so bitterly complained, been adopted for the purpose of avoiding war? Such have been the acts of the Executive, which conclusively showed their aversion to a rupture with Great Britain. But what do we find to be the conduct of the President since the last session of Congress? So anxious was he for a restoration of peace, that the intelligence of our declaration of war had scarcely reached England, until the terms upon which its calamities might be arrested were made known to the Government of that country. This, too, was done in opposition to the practice of every country. Terms should be proposed by the Power committing the wrong. Yet this was done to effect a pacification. Had not Mr. Russell urged the subject so far as to excite the sneers of Lord Castlereagh? Did not all these things go completely to disprove what had been said? And did they not clearly manifest that the views of our Government had always been pacific, and that they were entirely directed to a settlement of the differences which existed, upon terms honorable to both countries? But these things gentlemen had not recollected, or had endeavored to warp to meet their own purposes. Nothing could reconcile the member from Massachusetts to the Administration. When pacific measures were resorted to in order to heal the wounds the enemy were inflicting, the Government was then declared to be destitute of spirit to vindicate its insulted honor and its violated rights. It was said, the men at that time in power "could not be kicked into a war." And when war has at length been resorted to, the gentleman was more clamorous, and tenfold more cruel in his declamations. The war was denounced as immoral, and one that might have been avoided if an amicable disposition had existed in the Cabinet. These inconsistencies it would become the honorable gentleman to reconcile; and he presumed that some difficulty would be found in convincing any man of intelligence that we were solicitous for a war with Great Britain. What, sir, desirous of a war with a nation whose flag was proudly waving victorious on every sea, a nation that could transport her armies to the most distant shores? The idea was too wild for any man seriously to entertain.

The gentleman had become lately very jealous of a standing army. This, he presumed, was rather in appearance than reality: for, in the journals of the last session of Congress, his name would be found recorded as having voted for the bill for raising twenty-five thousand men, and for filling up the ranks in the old establishment, amounting to ten thousand more. We have then record evidence that the gentleman, last Winter, when the United States were at peace, was in favor of an army of thirty-five thousand men. No jealousy then existed in his mind of an army of that magnitude, even on the Peace Establishment. He never intended that army for war and invasion, for he was opposed to both. And, said Mr. A., he was much mistaken if he had not heard the gentleman offer, as an apology for that vote, that he was always in favor of a standing army to a certain extent. But now, when the country was engaged in a war with Great Britain, an addition to the Army of twenty thousand men was considered as alarming and dangerous to the liberties of the people. Friendly as he had been to that Administration that had raised a standing army in time of peace, the honorable member ought to be the last to feel any apprehension in time of war of an army little larger than that which in time of peace had received his sanction and approbation.

But, upon the subject of impressment, in order to produce, if possible, union at home, and to remove from our enemy every pretext which otherwise she might have for the continuation of that degrading practice, he was perfectly willing to give his sanction to a law which should exclude British seamen from the public ships and merchant vessels of the United States; but he would not advance a step further in negotiation. And if, upon the passage of such a law, Great Britain would refuse to terminate hostilities, we should prove to the world that no efforts on our part were left unexerted to bring about a peace not inconsistent with the interests or honor of either country. But he despaired of any measure producing union at home, when it had been declared by the honorable gentleman, to whom he had occasion so often to allude, that he would not unite unless we would give over the invasion of Canada, and cease at once all hostile preparations. Did he wish the Government to lay a loyal petition at the foot of the throne, and humbly beseech His Majesty to forgive us our errors, and take us under his royal protection? No, sir; history would show that this was not a proper plan to pave the way to peace with England. He would consider the proposition of the gentleman, if adopted, as a degradation to the nation, and sooner than submit to it he would forego all advantages to be derived from a union of sentiment. He would continue the war until the latest period of his life, and his parting breath should be spent in admonishing his children to continue the contest. Was it possible that we could suffer our native-born citizens to be seized by a foreign Government in violation of every right either human or divine? Even in the worst and most degraded periods of the histories of Greece and Rome, such an injury would not have been tolerated. There it was considered honorable and glorious to die for one's country. But here self-interest, the predominating vice of civilized society, had seized upon the heart and frozen up its most generous sentiments. The love of gain corrupts and vitiates the best principles of man's nature, and we are to exhibit ourselves to the present generation, and to posterity, as the standing and solitary monument of a nation free and unwilling to assert her rights—of a people jealous of their liberties, and reluctant to vindicate their honor. Yes, sir, said he, ingloriously abandon the contest, and we should become "a fixed figure for the hand of Scorn to point its slow unmoving finger at." Why did we love the Government under which we lived? Because of the blessings it was calculated to bestow on us and our descendants. Because it threw around the property and liberty of the citizen the mantle of its protection. Would gentlemen remove this safeguard and throw the liberty and personal security of the citizen open to the violation of every country that felt a disposition to infringe on our rights? He hoped not. He had too high an opinion of the principles which pervaded the country at large to suppose such a step possible.

It had been said, by a gentleman from Connecticut, that an ingenious catalogue of the causes which had produced the war, had been drawn up, and that it was folly to have gone to war until the cause of it was felt by every man in the nation. For his part he could not see that much ingenuity was required to discover that our vessels had been pillaged—that our citizens had been seized by British press-gangs; and if he had not discovered it before that "ingenious" catalogue was made out, he had a much smaller portion of ingenuity than he had supposed him to possess. He would ask him if the Orders in Council were not felt in every part of the country? Did not the Eastern States feel them, in the depression of their commerce and navigation? Did not the Southern and Middle States feel them, in the reduced prices of the productions of the soil?

Mr. A. declared that, notwithstanding the clamor of French influence and French alliance, he felt no apprehensions upon that subject, as he was well convinced it was not the intention or wish of our Government to engulf us in the unfathomable vortex of European warfare. One word to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GOLD) and he had done. It had been considered by him as a most unfortunate circumstance that we should be engaged in a war with Great Britain when Russia was struggling for her independence. The most amicable relations existed, it was true, between Russia and the United States; but would the gentleman have us on that account to submit to every species of indignity from the ally of that Power? He beheld with as much detestation and abhorrence the conduct of the French Emperor as any man could possibly do. His ambitious progress was everywhere marked with blood. The vengeance of Heaven, he trusted, would arrest him in his career to universal conquest and dominion. The present condition of Russia, although her people groaned under a despotism of the most unrelenting nature, must excite the sympathy of every man in this country, because she was contending for her independence, and he would wish her complete success in the war in which she was now engaged, but that her triumph would protract the restoration of peace to his own country.

Mr. GRUNDY.—Mr. Speaker, had this debate been confined to the bill before you, I should certainly not have troubled the House with any remarks of mine; but as the gentlemen opposed to the war in which we are engaged have selected this as a fit occasion to bring before this House and the nation a full view of all the relations which exist between this and other countries, an apology at least is furnished for a member of that committee, to whose examination these subjects have been confided, to give his ideas upon the various points suggested. This I shall endeavor to do with temper and moderation. Neither invective, philippic, nor slander, shall constitute any part of what I have to say. To minds capable of feasting on food of that sort, I shall entirely leave the unenvied task of giving the portrait of a drawing-room, and of describing Eastern democracy on this floor.* To me, sir, it affords no pleasure to inflict pain on others, and therefore, although the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) merits all the severity which can be permitted in this House, I shall forbear. I will not charge him with British influence, or with having such strong English partialities, that there is no room left for his own country. This may possibly not be the case; for, notwithstanding all we have seen and heard, it should be remembered that we are so constructed, that the strongest appearances, at times, deceive us. I will now proceed to state, as accurately and as concisely as I am able, the manner in which the points in difference between the two nations ought to be considered.

Upon some of the subjects in controversy, for instance, that of impressment, negotiation had been tried unsuccessfully for twenty years, as I will show before I sit down, from the public records of the country; on others it had been tried for a shorter period. At the last session of Congress, when every hope of obtaining justice in any other way was lost, the United States declared war, not to procure a repeal of the Orders in Council only, but to obtain redress for the unjust spoliation which had been committed on the property of American citizens, and to cause

* Mr. Grundy, in this place, as well as other speakers, who preceded and followed him in debate, are understood to have had allusion in this remark to certain offensive observations of Mr. Quincy, which do not appear in the printed report of his speech, as corrected by himself. One of these expressions designated the Eastern democrats, among other opprobrious epithets, as toads, or reptiles, which spread their slime in the drawing room.

Great Britain to cease the practice of impressment. Other causes of irritation existed, but these were the prominent causes of the war. It may be taken as granted, in this discussion, that those orders are revoked, notwithstanding the objectionable manner of the revocation. You are now asked to lay down the sword before you have obtained any of the objects of the war, except the abolition of these obnoxious orders. I request gentlemen to reflect, whether this is not, in point of fact, an abandonment of the other points in dispute? Do you not, by ceasing to prosecute the war which is already commenced, declare, in the strongest possible terms, that you will not make war for the injuries which remain unredressed? Can any man persuade himself that you will obtain that by negotiation for which you have determined you will not fight! and that, too, from a nation at all times disposed to depress this growing country? That politician must have a very imperfect knowledge of the considerations which influence all Cabinets, who does not know that the strongest inducement which can be brought to operate in favor of an injured nation, is the apprehension of retaliation, or fear of war, entertained by the other party. I cannot, perhaps, establish this more clearly in any other way than by recurring to the history of a transaction which took place between the United States and Great Britain. Immediately after the attack on the Chesapeake, this Government demanded reparation. The terms proposed were reasonable, and such as a nation, inclined to act justly, would promptly have acceded to. For five years, or more, did the British Government refuse, or rather fail, to make that arrangement, which, at the last session, produced a satisfactory adjustment on that subject. Why, sir, was justice so long delayed, and why was it at last obtained? The British Minister discovered a determination in Congress to submit no longer. He saw that, unless something was done, friendly relations between the two countries must immediately cease. He saw that public sentiment called so loudly for an opportunity of obtaining that justice by force which had been refused to fair argument, that he granted us that reasonable satisfaction which had been so long withheld. Sir, had he not seen the approaching storm, no atonement for that wanton outrage on our national sovereignty had yet been made. If you now say that you will not prosecute the war, the enemy must view it as a decision pronounced by this Government, that war shall not be waged by the American nation for the impressment of her citizens, or for depredations committed on commerce. It might as well be said, in plain, intelligible language, that the ocean is to be abandoned by the people of the United States, except so far as depends on the will of Great Britain. If both the property and liberty of American citizens on the ocean are subject to her disposal, you cease to possess the rights of a sovereign and independent nation. For my own part, if we have the right to claim security for the liberty and property of our citizens against that nation, of which no man dare express a doubt, I am for asserting it until the object is attained, or the ability of this nation fails; of the latter I have no fear.

It is pretended, that this Government is not desirous of peace, and that this is a war of conquest and ambition. I beg gentlemen to refrain from making statements which they themselves do not believe. After the declaration of war, what has been the conduct of the Executive? Through Mr. Russell, our Chargé des Affaires at London, they have offered to conclude an armistice on terms which would remove every pretext for complaint on the part of Great Britain. He proposed that this country should exclude from her service British seamen. It is true that Lord Castlereagh urged Mr. Russell's want of powers, and stated that the American Congress alone could make the necessary provisions on that subject. If, however, sincerity had existed with the British Ministry, a temporary arrangement could have been made, by which hostilities would have been suspended until the legitimate authorities of this country could have expressed an opinion. If Mr. R. had not adequate powers to conclude an armistice, the proposition made by Mr. Monroe to Admiral Warren was not liable to the same objection. In substance, both propositions were the same; to the latter, no offer of compliance has been tendered. If I have any objections to the late overtures made by the Executive, it is that too great an anxiety for peace is manifested; but when the nature of our institutions is consulted, a strong propensity for domestic quiet is discovered; and, therefore, the Administration should be indulged in any measure calculated to restore harmony between the two countries, provided the honor and interests of the nation are not compromised.

I ask gentlemen in opposition to lay aside party feelings, and reflect whether, if we now recede, points are not conceded to the enemy, which they would not yield if in power. They affect to be the followers of WASHINGTON. I will show them what his opinions were on the subject of impressment. From them the pretended Washingtonians of the present day will discover their degeneracy. Yes, sir, the Father of his Country too well understood the value of liberty ever to consent that the most obscure individual of his country should be deprived of it by a foreign despot. So early as the year 1792, the British nation commenced the practice of impressment, as now exercised by it. On the 11th day of June, in that year, the then Secretary of State addressed a letter to Mr. Pinkney, the American Minister at London, in which the practice of impressment is strongly reprobated; and let it be remembered, that although this letter was written by the Secretary, it contained the sentiments of the President of the United States. In order that the House may more fully comprehend what were the sentiments of that man, whose memory we all venerate, I will read so much of the letter referred to as relates to this subject:

"The peculiar custom in England of impressing seamen on every appearance of war will occasionally expose our seamen to peculiar oppressions and vexations. It will be expedient that you take proper opportunities in the meantime of conferring with the Minister on this subject, in order to form some arrangement for the protection of our seamen on those occasions. We entirely reject the mode which was the subject of a conversation between Mr. Morris and him; which was, that our seamen should always carry about them certificates of their citizenship. This is a condition never yet submitted to by any nation—one with which seamen would never have the precaution to comply. The casualties of their calling would expose them to the constant destruction or loss of this paper evidence; and thus the British Government would be armed with legal authority to impress the whole of our seamen. The simplest rule will be, that the vessel being American, shall be evidence that the seamen on board her are such."

If, at so early a period, the right of search for men was objected to by this Government, how much more forcible is the objection now? We were then a young nation; we have since increased in resources by which our rights can be maintained; whilst the violation of those rights have been augmented in a greater degree. On the 6th of November, 1792, the Secretary of State wrote to the American Minister at London a letter, in which, when speaking on the subject of impressment, the following language is used: "It is unnecessary to develop to you the inconveniences of this conduct, and the impossibility of letting it go on. I hope you will be able to make the British Ministry sensible of the necessity of punishing the past and preventing the future." I know, Mr. Speaker, that there is danger of fatiguing the House by recurring to documents of this sort, but my apology is a good one: those to which I refer have never been printed for the information of the members of this House, nor have the public had an opportunity of inspecting them. I hope, therefore, to be indulged in pursuing the sentiments of former Administrations further on a subject of so much interest. On the 20th of February, 1800, Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, addressed the President of the United States on the subject of a proposed treaty between the two countries, upon which occasion he makes the following remark: "That he transmits Mr. Liston's note of the 4th of February, together with his project of a treaty for the reciprocal delivery of deserters; which appears to the Secretary utterly inadmissible, unless it would put an end to impressment; which Mr. Liston seemed to imagine, while the seventh paragraph of his project expressly recognises the right of impressing British subjects, and consequently American citizens as at present." Mr. Wolcott, Secretary of the Treasury, when giving his opinion to the President, says—"That the project of a treaty proposed by His Britannic Majesty for the reciprocal delivery of deserters from the land and naval service does not sufficiently provide against the impressment of American seamen, and is therefore deemed inadmissible."

Mr. Stoddert, who acted as Secretary of the Navy, at that period, when advising the President on the same subject, says—"That the Secretary is clearly of opinion that it is better to have no article, and meet all consequences, than not to enumerate merchant vessels, on the high seas, among the things not to be forcibly entered in search of deserters."

The letter of the present Chief Justice of the United States to Mr. King, Minister at London, dated on the 20th of September, 1800, places this subject in a strong light; he says—

"The impressment of our seamen is an injury of very serious magnitude, which deeply affects the feelings and the honor of the nation. This valuable class of men is composed of natives and foreigners, who engage voluntarily in our service. No right has been asserted to impress the natives of America. Yet they are impressed; they are dragged on board British ships of war, with the evidence of citizenship in their hand, and forced by violence then to serve until conclusive testimonials of their birth can be obtained. These must generally be sought for on this side the Atlantic. In the meantime acknowledged violence is practised on a free citizen of the United States by compelling him to engage and to continue in foreign service. Although the Lords of the Admiralty uniformly direct their discharge on the production of this testimony, yet many must perish unrelieved, and all are detained a considerable time in lawless and injurious confinement. It is the duty as well as the right of a friendly nation to require that measures be taken by the British Government to prevent the continued repetition of such violence by its agents. This can only be done by punishing and frowning on those who perpetrate it. The mere release of the injured, after a long course of service and of suffering, is no compensation for the past and no security for the future. It is impossible not to believe that the decisive interference of the Government in this respect would prevent a practice, the continuance of which must inevitably produce discord between two nations which ought to be friends to each other."

In another part of the same letter, Mr. Marshall observes, "the United States require positively that their seamen who are not British subjects, whether born in America or elsewhere, shall be exempt from impressment."

From these documents we clearly collect what was the view which the first and second Presidents of the United States had on this subject, and that of the principal officers of the Government. It appears that this exemption from impressment is no new claim set up by men now in power. It is as old as the Government itself, and there never has been, nor can there be, an Administration in this country who dare surrender this point to any foreign Power. Once relinquished, we had as well abandon the ocean altogether. If the liberty of American citizens is to be subject to the will, not of the English Government, but what is infinitely worse, of every petty officer that navigates a British ship, it is in vain that we boast of freedom; we do not possess it; and only let the British Government understand you distinctly on this point, and you need talk no more of American commerce. When the gentleman from Massachusetts declaimed so feelingly in favor of the innocent Canadians, I was astonished that he expressed no sympathy for the sufferings of the thousands of Americans who have forcibly been dragged from their country, their friends, their families, and everything that is dear to man! and compelled to serve on board the vessels of the enemy, even against their own country. If there be nothing in the East which can awaken his sympathies, I ask him to turn his eyes to the West; he will there see that we have lost our fathers and our brothers. Our children have been butchered in their cradles; our mothers, our sisters, our daughters, and our wives, have been led into savage captivity. If, sir, that gentleman has his feelings so enlisted on the side of the enemies of his country as to be unable to sympathize with us, I will not, I cannot acknowledge him as my political brother. Mr. Speaker, I name the gentleman from Massachusetts particularly, because he has pre-eminently distinguished himself above his fellows in this debate; they have deigned to reason upon the subject, but this course is too dull for him. Not content with denouncing everything that has occurred for twelve years past, and railing against the present, he has gone into futurity, and predicted the events which are to take place for four years to come. I beg the gentleman from Massachusetts to recollect that he treads American soil. I entreat him to remember the country in which he was born, and for which his father fought. Sir, the shameful surrender of the American army at Detroit astonished me when I heard it; but now astonishment ceases, after what I have seen and heard on this floor. It is not strange that treason should be found in the camp.

Gentlemen on the other side have spoken of our misfortunes on land; this seems indeed to constitute the burden of their song, and they attribute them in a great degree to the ill-management of the Executive. If they will look fairly into this subject, they will find the true cause originating in this House; they will see that the disunion which prevails here extends itself throughout the country; and this it is that renders the American arms feeble and inefficacious; and they will also discover that the enemy sees in that invidious line, which separates the political parties in this House, a sure indication of that severance of the States, upon which Great Britain builds her hopes. Sir, I ask the gentleman from New York (Mr. GOLD) why he has dwelt with such peculiar pleasure upon the distresses now prevailing in the Army, which he affirms have not yet reached their highest limits? If the gentleman intended by this to discourage the recruiting service, his object is certainly not his country's good; but I trust his predictions will not be verified; it must be known to him that raw troops are always liable to diseases, from which those accustomed to the camp are exempt; all experience in military operations proves this fact.

Some gentlemen allege that it is immoral, and even irreligious, to attack the Canadians, because they have done us no harm. Such political opinions are formed on a very limited and contracted basis. Is it not known that in every war the innocent and unoffending citizens or subjects of a community suffer for the crimes of their rulers? What injury had those British sailors done us who fell in the several engagements with Captains Hull, Jones, and Decatur? Not only had they committed no wrong on us, but never had they in all probability conceived a thought to do so. They fell innocent victims to the ambition of their tyrannical master.

It is pretended that French influence has found its way into our councils. Sir, they who make these insinuations do not themselves believe them; they use them to deceive those who have not a fair opportunity of judging for themselves. Look at the instructions given by the Executive to our Ministers at Paris and London: they require from France indemnity for past injuries as a preliminary to negotiation. From England we ask only that she cease to injure us, and we will negotiate for the past—showing evidently a disposition to act more rigidly towards France than England—and, if either Power has cause of complaint, it is clear England has none. Sir, that France has injured this country all admit. For myself I am no apologist for the French Emperor; but I do not possess such enmity against any nation as to forget what is due to my own. If this Government had the power to humble the tyrant of continental Europe for the injuries he has inflicted upon us, I would unite with the gentleman from Massachusetts in pronouncing its accomplishment, "the celestial glory of America," instead of applying those expressions to the disasters and misfortunes of our own country. But, sir, after all the defeats of which gentlemen speak so boastfully, and convert into causes of triumph to themselves, I feel not discouraged. True, one general officer may prove a traitor, another may mismanage a campaign, but the American soldiery have never disgraced themselves or their country; they have in every contest evinced firmness, bravery, and skill. They only want a leader worthy to command an army of freemen, and they will transmit to their posterity the blessings of liberty, or perish in the attempt.

It has been said, by a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PEARSON,) that, if we exclude British seamen from our service by law, one of two things must happen, either a peace would be the result, or the people of this country all unite in a vigorous prosecution of the war. If I have mistaken the meaning of the gentleman, I wish him to correct me at this time, and answer the question directly, if, in that event, he will support the war? [Mr. PEARSON explained.] Mr. GRUNDY proceeded: Sir, from the explanation given, it will, I fear, be as difficult to come to an understanding with that gentleman, as it is to accommodate the points in dispute with the British Ministry; for, although the gentleman says he will not surrender an essential right of the country, a question might be made by him as to what were essential rights. I will, nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, make one more effort to elicit the opinion of the gentleman on this subject. I ask him whether he considers the impressment of American seamen "a violation of an essential right of this country?" [Mr. PEARSON said he so considered it.] Then, said Mr. GRUNDY, from the gentleman's own declaration, he is bound to support us in the war, if the principle of impressment is not relinquished by Great Britain. I have no hesitation in saying, that, in a time of peace, I am willing British seamen, not naturalized in this country, should be excluded from our service. I believe that such a regulation would inflict no injury or inconvenience on the country. Whenever, therefore, a proposition to this effect is made, so as to take effect at the conclusion of the war, I shall vote for it. I consider it a direct encouragement to our own seamen, calculated to foster and cherish the enterprise and industry of that important class of our citizens. Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts has touched a topic peculiarly delicate, as I had supposed to some men in this country: I allude to the disclosures made to this Government by John Henry. The gentleman charges the Administration with having wantonly wasted fifty thousand dollars of the public money in purchasing documents of no intrinsic value. I have no knowledge of the sum given, or that anything was given for this disclosure, but, if a million had been given, I, for one, should not have thought it too much, were I satisfied that it could not have been had for less. Sir, that disclosure taught the people of this country knowledge which could be acquired in no other way. It affords an authentic historical fact of the perfidy of the British Ministry, which must excite against them the execration of the civilized world. It ought to warn the people of the United States, to read with caution the newspaper essays, masking, under professions of patriotism, the productions of foreign influence and gold.

I will now, sir, reply to a remark made by my friend from Virginia; and I take this opportunity of entering my protest against the doctrine which he advanced. He says, we must have an augmentation of the regular force, to put down insurrection at home. I disclaim the idea. We want an increase of the Army to fight against the enemies of the country, and not to turn their arms against their brethren. Sir, I do not fear insurrection. The factious members of this House may vapor much, and evince a strong disposition to do mischief, but, in the sober good sense of the people at home there is a corrective. There is too much intelligence in every quarter of our country to sacrifice the Constitution—the ark of our political safety—to promote the views of an ambitious faction.

A few words, sir, on the provisions of the bill before you, and I have done. It contemplates enlistments for one year, and this is considered objectionable. I admit the force of the objection: five years' men are better than those enlisted for one year. But, let gentlemen reflect, as the honorable member from Virginia (Mr. PLEASANTS) told them the other day, that the question is, not what kind of force is best, but what is the best within your power, taking into view the time at which you wish them to act. Five years' men, to the number wanted, you cannot get; those for one year you can. The question is not whether men on long enlistment are not better than those enlisted for a shorter period, but whether a force of the latter description is not better than no force at all. I do feel astonished that gentlemen who have declared the war, and are responsible for the prosecution of it, have not paid more attention to the course of argument observed by the Opposition. At one moment they tell you that you cannot get a sufficient force on long enlistments, and in the next breath they deprecate short enlistments. Militia and volunteers have been long since denounced by them as inefficient, and the employment of them a useless waste of the public treasure. On what species of force, then, Mr. Speaker, must we rely? If this side of the House will be misled by the crooked councils of the Opposition, we who have declared the war must carry it on without an army; and, instead of producing an acknowledgment of our just rights, our imbecility will become proverbial; our enemy will despise and pity us, and the people will justly frown us into retirement.

I am of opinion that this bill, if passed, will be productive of great good. The force will not only be useful for twelve months, but it constitutes an excellent fund out of which to draw men on to longer enlistments, should the exigencies of the country require it. I submit to the gentleman from Virginia, whether he has used the experience he acquired in the Revolution to the best advantage? He says the first enlistments were for six weeks, then for three months; and the time was thus regularly increased, until, at last, enlistments were made during the war. He also says, that the frequent expiration of service produced great inconveniences. No doubt this was the case. But, has the gentleman reflected on the probable consequence to the country, at that period, had the then Congress only authorized those to be enlisted who would engage to serve during the war? Is he certain that an army would have been obtained at all? I am of opinion, that, after you have men in the field, and after they become attached to a military life, it is easier to prevail on them to remain, than to induce them to abandon their domestic attachments, and join the Army in the first instance.

Mr. TROUP said, that observations had fallen from certain gentlemen, which merited reply and deserved correction. The two gentlemen who had just sat down (Messrs. GRUNDY and ARCHER) had noticed some of those observations in a handsome manner, and had given the appropriate answer. There yet remained some points which it would be proper to notice; it was the comparative decorum with which they were made that entitled them to respect. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) had declared that this Government had insisted in past time, and did still continue to insist, that the American flag should cover all descriptions of persons sailing under it, and that this perseverance in an erroneous principle had been the cause of the war, and of all the calamities the nation had suffered. Mr. T. said, he was the more surprised to hear a round, unqualified declaration of this kind from the gentleman, because he had given repeated proofs to the House of the attention which he bestowed on the public documents, and the assiduity with which he had studied them; there were two of them, especially, which the gentleman must have read, and, reading, could not fail to have remembered; one of no very remote date, the other very recent, and very interesting; it would be doing injustice to the gentleman to believe they were not strongly imprinted on his memory, yet did both those documents more plainly and directly contradict the allegation of the gentleman. Long before the period, however, to which I refer, Mr. King, our Minister at London, had written to the Secretary of State "that, on this subject, viz: 'impressment' we had again and again offered to concur in a convention, which we thought practicable to be formed, and which would settle these questions in a manner that would be safe for England and satisfactory to us." (Letter 15th March, 1799.) The first document after this is a letter of instruction from the Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe, Minister at the Court of St. James, dated May 29th, 1807, soon after the failure of the treaty concluded by himself and Mr. Pinkney, and is to the following purport:

"It is agreed that, after the term of — months, computed from the exchange of ratifications, and during a war in which either of the contracting parties may be engaged, neither of them will permit any seaman, not being its own citizen or subject, and being a citizen or subject of the other party, who shall not have been for two years at least, prior to that date, constantly and voluntarily in the service or within the jurisdiction of the parties respectively, to enter or be employed on board any of its vessels navigating the high seas; and proper regulations, enforced by adequate penalties, shall be mutually established for distinguishing the seamen of the parties, respectively, and for giving full effect to this stipulation."

Here, then, is documentary evidence that, so far back as the year 1807, the American Government had tendered to the British Cabinet a proposition, the effect of which was to exempt from the protection of the American flag, or, what is the same thing, to exclude from the American service every description of persons, saving American native-born and naturalized citizens. Does the gentleman insist that the naturalized citizen should not be protected? If he does not, will he authorize the British to search and impress, though the American Government should prohibit, by all the penalties of law, foreigners of any description from entering into the service of her merchant vessels? Does he mean that we shall be exposed to the vexatious practice of search and impressment, notwithstanding the Government shall do everything in its power to prevent British subjects from entering into its service? But, Mr. Speaker, if the proposition of Mr. Monroe did not go far enough for the gentleman, the proposition of Mr. Russell unquestionably did. Here it is:

"I finally offered, in order to answer at once all the observations and inquiries of Lord Castlereagh, that the proposed understanding should be expressed in the most general terms. That the laws to take effect on the discontinuance of the practice of impressment should prohibit the employment of the native subjects or citizens of the one State, excepting such only as had already been naturalized, on board the private or public ships of the other. Thus removing any objection that might have been raised with regard to the future effect of naturalization or the formal renunciation of any pretended right."

The effect of this proposition of Mr. Russell, sir, is not only the exclusion of British subjects from American employ, but the exclusion of British subjects who may in future be naturalized in the United States. Hence our flag would have covered none but native Americans, and such British subjects as had been before naturalized. Having employed the power of the country; having resorted to all the pains and penalties which the law can provide to prohibit this description of persons from serving on board American vessels, will the gentleman, notwithstanding, insist that British commanders shall enter our vessels to make search for seamen? If, notwithstanding the prohibition, it were permitted to British officers to make search for seamen, the prohibition had better not be made; the practice might as well go on in all the latitude of tyranny and oppression which has distinguished it.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON) has been pleased, in the course of his observations on this subject, to offer to the House a project for a peace. He would have the Legislature to pass laws prohibiting the employ of British seamen in our service, leaving the President to make a tender of those laws through fit and proper characters to the British Government as the basis of an adjustment. The gentleman is to accomplish two objects by his project—a union of parties and a peace with the enemy; both objects, sir, are not less interesting to me than to the gentleman; but, I very much doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether either of them be attainable. The gentleman not only requires a specific form to be given to the proposition itself, but it is an essential condition on which he is to enter into the union, that the proposition be tendered to the British Government by such characters as he will approve; by men, as he says, without office and without expectation of office. Now, sir, although it may not be very difficult to find men who do not hold office; it would seem to me to be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to find men without expectation of office; and yet the gentleman would be under no obligation to unite with us unless his project were tendered to the British Government by such men. Mr. Pinkney had passed for a Federalist both in this country and England; he had tendered a very important proposition to the British Government; but as the gentlemen on the other side had always doubted the sincerity of the Government in making that overture, it is to be presumed that whatever confidence they might have had in Mr.

Pinkney as a politician, they had ceased to respect him as a fit person to make propositions to the British Government. Sir, I fear it is as difficult to unite parties as to conciliate the British Government. Both the gentlemen from Connecticut and North Carolina have mistaken the character of that Government; she is not to be conciliated. If they sincerely want peace, they must employ the resources and energies of the country to coerce it. This is susceptible of proof; repeated overtures have been made in the most amicable spirit, and have been uniformly rejected, and under circumstances which left no doubt of the lurking hostility which dictated the rejection.

The proposition of Mr. Monroe of 1807 had failed; the proposition of Mr. Pinkney of 1810 and 1811 had failed; the recent proposition of Mr. Russell had failed. Of the first, I have already spoken. Give me leave to say something of the second. The failure of the second proposition, viz: to continue the non-intercourse against France, repealing it as to England, provided England would rescind her Orders in Council, is one of the most extraordinary and unaccountable occurrences in political history. Be it remembered, sir, that this proposition was substantially a proposition to go to war on the side of England against France, provided England would rescind her orders—France continuing her decrees. I say this was the proposition, substantially, because this was the inevitable effect of it, to place the United States in the same relation to England as they are now placed in relation to France—not with a view, Mr. Speaker, to an alliance with either; far from it; but, to the ultimate vindication of their own just rights against the aggressions of either of them—warring for themselves, and for themselves making peace. But, most strange to say, Mr. Speaker, this voluntary tender of our friendship was disdainfully rejected; at a period, too, when England, pressed by a formidable war, was standing as it were on her last legs—all Europe united against her—and when, according to her own declaration, her very existence was at stake; when, too, the single condition of this friendly proposition was, that England should recall a measure, which, but a short time after, she was forced to abandon to the clamors and distresses of her own people. No, said England, we want not your friendship; it is of no value to us; you have not courage and fortitude to defend, manfully, your own just rights, and how can I expect that you will render important service to me? It is altogether impossible, sir, to account for the conduct of England, without supposing her to have entertained such sentiments. And will the gentleman from North Carolina flatter himself with the belief, that after the failure of such a proposition, England is to be conciliated by his project—a project substantially the same as that of Mr. Monroe of 1807, and identically the proposition of Mr. Russell in 1812? But, the gentleman derives hope from the ground on which Mr. Russell's proposal was rejected. Mr. Russell, says the gentleman, was not regularly commissioned, nor was he formally instructed to make the proposition in the latitude in which he tendered it. But, sir, was not the letter of the Secretary of State a sufficient commission for him? And, suppose Mr. Russell, consulting the spirit rather than the letter of his instructions, had given to the proposition a somewhat more liberal character, it was not on this ground the proposition was rejected; it was rejected, as Lord Castlereagh expressly said, because England would never consent to entertain any proposal which went to abridge her right of impressment; that any arrangement for the limitation of this right was impracticable, and had always been so; that it was true, on this subject, their friends in Congress—meaning the Federalists—had believed in the practicability of an arrangement; but they were mistaken. Mr. King was as far from accomplishing it as Mr. Monroe. That, in fact, it was in vain to negotiate about it. Popular feeling would not permit them to make any concession upon the subject. This is the language of Lord Castlereagh. But, suppose it had not been: If the British cabinet were sincerely disposed to listen to the proposal, they would have said so, notwithstanding any objection which could have been taken to the authority or power of Mr. Russell. Lord Castlereagh would have said, for instance, that the proposition was a fair one; that, if offered by an agent with full powers, it would be entertained; if inconvenient to make it the basis of negotiation at London, it might be made the basis of negotiation at Washington. But this, sir, never entered into the head of Lord Castlereagh. The answer to Mr. Russell was, that the thing was wholly impracticable, and had always been so. But, the gentleman desires us to repeat the same proposition, that we may receive the same answer.

I trust, sir, by this time, I have been able to satisfy the gentleman that England is not to be conciliated. Will the gentleman and his friends unite with me in a project of coercion—a project in which I have no less confidence than the gentleman from North Carolina in his own; yes, sir, so much confidence that I would almost be tempted to make a bargain with the gentleman to take any of their projects, however faaciful, if, within a reasonable time, the enemy did not yield to united councils and an active war. My project is embargo—an immediate, entire, and rigidly executed embargo, embracing as well the coasting as foreign trade, and, if you please, sir, a provision by law for naturalizing British seamen, voluntarily entering into the service of the United States, during the war—the converse of the proposition of the gentleman. An embargo may be resorted to at this moment with comparatively little sacrifice: the foreign trade is inconsiderable; the coasting trade is almost entirely interrupted. The effect of an embargo would be,

1. To keep our own commerce safe at home, leaving the commerce of the enemy exposed to the assaults of our privateers and public vessels;

2. To distress the enemy at home, in his colonies, and on the Peninsula;

3. To give ten-fold vigor to the war, by making a diversion of men and of capital in favor of our privateers, and of men in favor of our public vessels ;

4. To facilitate the reduction of Canada, by creating partial scarcity, at least—perhaps absolute distress.

Now is the moment, Mr. Speaker, for this embargo. The British papers announce that the price of bread has risen on the heel of the harvest, though the harvest has been described as abundant. The proclamations of the Prince Regent prohibit the conversion of grain into starch and the use of grain in the breweries. Can we have stronger evidence of apprehended scarcity? Sir, of the force and effect with which this measure may be wielded against the enemy, we do not want more decisive proof than that which the enemy himself has furnished—proof which is a source of triumph and exultation to every American. Two facts were unfolded. First, by the examination before the British House of Commons, it had been shown that if the British people were not at all times and under all circumstances absolutely dependent on us for a market for their manufactures, they were at this time and in the present state of the world absolutely dependent; second, that if not always, and in every state of things, absolutely dependent on us for supplies of provisions, they were in the present state of Europe absolutely dependent. I beseech the gentlemen, therefore, to take the embargo as a sure measure of attaining what they profess so much to desire—peace. But, sir, the other measure which I tender to the gentlemen, though not so powerful and efficient against the enemy, is not less interesting: The protection of seamen of every description, during the war, who shall be found fighting under the American flag—to naturalize the seaman voluntarily enlisting on board the armed vessels of the United States, and having naturalized, to protect him with the power of the country.

Whatever, Mr. Speaker, have been our misfortunes or reverses on the land, we may enjoy the consolation that the gallantry and skill of our seamen will make the war, if not a short, yet certainly an honorable one for the country; the war was undertaken chiefly for them; they will be chiefly instrumental in waging it, and I have no doubt they will make it a glorious one for themselves and for all of us; but they ought to be protected. Whatever be the description or character of the seaman fighting under the American flag, that seaman ought to be protected. Not a hair of his head should be touched by the enemy with impunity. In considering, Mr. Speaker, the right, propriety, and justice, of adopting this regulation, we are naturally led to advert to the British doctrine and practice on this subject; and here I beg leave to remark that it is scarcely possible for the imagination to conceive anything more inconsistent and contradictory than the British doctrine and practice. She sets up a principle of public law—be it arbitrary or be it sound, no matter—she requires the observance of it from all other nations as a settled principle of public law. So long as it suits her to respect, she respects it; whenever it suits her to violate, she violates it; her principle is, that allegiance is natural, perpetual, and inalienable; that it is born with the subject and descends with him into the grave; that once a British subject, always a British subject. She enforces this doctrine when she impresses from American vessels naturalized citizens; she enforces it when she threatens with death, as the Prince Regent has recently done in his proclamation, the British seaman of any description who may be found fighting under the American flag. She violates the doctrine, she tramples it under foot, when she declares by statute, that the American seaman entering voluntarily into her service, and continuing two years, is ipso facto naturalized. She violates the doctrine, she tramples it under foot, when she declares by statute, that the American seaman, contracting marriage with a British subject, is ipso facto naturalized. Thus, while in practice she condemns her own doctrine, she holds out every lure and temptation to the American seaman to desert the service of his country. It is not of much importance to us, Mr. Speaker, what doctrine the British Government may set up; all we ask is, that whatever the doctrine be, she will herself respect it. While her Government is in the habitual practice of naturalizing American seamen, she insists that our Government shall not naturalize her subjects. Assuredly, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be unlawful for us to do in relation to her what she does in relation to us. If she violates the public law in relation to us, that very public law authorizes us to violate it in relation to her. This is the law of retaliation. If she can naturalize our seamen serving two years on board her vessels, or contracting marriage with her subjects, we may naturalize her seamen entering voluntarily into our service; the period of two years, prescribed by the British statutes, makes no difference; it affects not the principle; it is entirely arbitrary; she might as well have prescribed two months, or two days, or two hours.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the British Government, in executing this regulation, has no regard to the character of the American seaman. It is unimportant to her whether the seaman be a deserter or not from the American service; it is immaterial whether he deserted before or after the war. Indeed no questions are asked; it is sufficient for the purpose that he is an American citizen willing to enter into her service, contracting marriage with a British subject, or serving two years on board her public ships. We demand nothing but reciprocity; there is no justice or equity where there is no reciprocity; and between nations there must be reciprocity, because there is perfect equality. Hence, Mr. Speaker, the justice, the lawfulness, the propriety of the regulation which I propose to you. Let us for a moment consider its expediency. Engaged in a war with a formidable Power, we find ourselves in one important respect occupying a vantage ground. Shall we avail ourselves of it to the injury of the enemy, or shall we voluntarily abandon it? The advantage results from the nature of things. The temptation to British seamen to enter the American service is stronger than the temptation to American seamen to enter the British service; and the fact is that more British seamen enter the American service than American seamen the British service. Shall we, I repeat, avail ourselves of this advantage during the war or not? Not, Mr. Speaker, that we want her seamen; not that they are essentially useful, much less necessary to our service; but that by taking them from the enemy we wound, and wound her where she is most vulnerable; the loss to her is much more important than the gain to us. She sets the example too; and when we offer as a condition of peace to prevent her seamen from entering into our service, we are instructed by her conduct that she chooses rather to enforce her practice of impressment by arms, than to rely on any pledge which we can give for the exclusion of her seamen from our employ.

I entreat gentlemen, therefore, to take my project of coercion instead of their project of propitiation. I have endeavored to show that the enemy is not to be conciliated.

First. Because the conciliatory overture of 1807, substantially the same with the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, was rejected.

Second. Because the overture of Mr. Russell, of 1812, identically the proposition of the gentleman, was rejected.

And third. Above all, that the overture repeatedly pressed by Mr. Pinkney, in 1810 and 1811, the inevitable effect of which would have been to throw us into the war on the side of England against France, was rejected.

Sir, it will be asked, with wonder and astonishment, how an overture of this character, so favorable to the obvious policy and interest of England, could have been thrown back upon us with disdain: incredible as the fact is, it is true. The cause, I repeat it, is only to be sought in the ineffable contempt in which she has held us; looking at our party divisions, and calculating on the weakness and fluctuation of our councils, she indulges a confident belief that the fatal and vibratory policy which yielded the old embargo to the clamors of a petty faction, would forever distinguish our course. Yes, sir, it is to the forced repeal of the old embargo that we must look for the causes of our protracted quarrel with England. We had given no incontestible evidence before of the influence of faction upon our councils; from that moment, however, she ceased to respect us; from that moment, she never dreamed that it was possible for us to go to war. When the war came, she let go the Orders in Council, to be sure, but she still continued to believe, and yet continues to believe, that the same spirit of faction which forced the repeal of the old embargo, would drive you out of the war. She has been looking with hope and with confidence to the issue of the late elections. Now that she is disappointed in the result, there is no saying what she will do. Our safest and wisest course is, however, to combine the resources of the country to give force and vigor to the war.

The objections to this bill, sir, are so various and contradictory that one is at a loss in what manner to consider them. By some, it is said the force is too great; by others, it is too small; by some, the term of enlistment is too short; by others, the innocent Canadians are to be overrun with it directly; and others, again, are opposed to it, because standing armies are dangerous to Republics, and because they confer great patronage and power.

We are embarked in the war; a military force is necessary to carry it on; it must be one of two descriptions—militia or regulars. When we ask gentlemen for the militia, they say no!—the militia belong to the States; they are constitutionally under the control of the State authorities for local defence; you shall not have them. Well, sir, in this, for the present, we have seemed to acquiesce, but, gentlemen, if you will not give us the militia, pray give us a regular force. No, say gentlemen, regular armies are dangerous to Republics; they confer too much patronage. Well, if you will neither give us regulars or militia, what will you do? And here, sir, at last, we have extorted their system. Will you believe it, sir? It is to repeal the declaration of war, lay down our arms, and throw ourselves upon the generosity of the enemy—he is a noble and generous foe, and will grant you reasonable terms. Thus, sir, are we to be bound hand and foot, with our locks shorn, and delivered over to the Philistines. We answer: this, gentlemen, may be a very good system for you, but it is a very bad one for us; if you will be united against us, we will endeavor to be united for the country against you; and when we negotiate, to negotiate with arms in our hands.

Sir, there is one argument which, on this subject, I think, merits attention. As the power of declaring war is lodged with the Legislature, so the power of conducting it is vested in the Executive. He is, constitutionally, the sole conductor of war; he has the planning of the campaign, the adaptation of force, and the uncontrolled direction of it in the field. The object of the war is a speedy and honorable peace, and it is his duty so to direct the national force, that the object be attained in the best manner, and with the least possible delay. He is responsible to you, therefore, for the wise and judicious application of the force; he is responsible to you by election, and by impeachment. Is not this responsibility of some value to you? Does it not become you to maintain and cherish it? You can only cherish it by granting, and granting liberally, the supplies asked for. If you withhold the supplies, you destroy the responsibility, you assume it to yourselves. If you grant the supplies with a niggardly or parsimonious hand, you impair the responsibility, you diminish it essentially. Liberal supplies of men and money are necessary to success; your armies and navies must be well found, or they are inefficient. How comes it the Emperor of France marched fifteen hundred miles from home, and vanquished forty millions of people, before we reduced a petty province of the enemy, with a population of only three hundred thousand, and lying at our very door? Military skill out of the question—it is because of his ample command of men and money. How is it that England makes such vast efforts on the Peninsula? It is because the Parliament never hesitates to grant the supplies, and to grant them liberally. But the term of enlistment is too short; so it is, if we want this force for the general purposes of the war; for the general purposes of the war, five years' men are infinitely better; but we do not want more five years' men than are already provided by law. The Executive asked this force in addition, as a peculiar force, and for a temporary occasion; they say, everything considered, it is best adapted to their object. Will we believe them? Will we give them what they ask? Or, will we give them what they do not ask?

Mr. T. concluded his speech, by adverting to the alleged misfortunes of the war, and attributing much of the delay of operations on land, to the unwarrantable efforts of party, in introducing insubordination and disaffection in the Eastern States, &c.

THURSDAY, January 7.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill confirming certain claims to land in the District of Vincennes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, also presented a bill for the relief of John Binnion; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. B. HALL moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a statement of the number of officers and men employed in the service of the United States, on board the Navy, from the 1st October, 1811, to the 30th September, 1812; on what ship or vessel, and by whom commanded; the amount of pay and rations furnished; the articles of provision purchased, and price; medicines, instruments, and hospital stores, furnished each vessel; the freight, store-rent, and contingent expenses; where, for what, and to whom paid; the expenditures on account of navy yards and docks, where expended, and what repairs made; the number of ordnance and small arms, and price, and of whom purchased; what vessels repaired, at what place, and the sum of money expended on each; the number of workmen and laborers employed in each navy yard, and the price given per day or month; the quantity of ship-timber and other naval stores on hand, and at what place; the number and description of vessels built and repaired at the navy yard at Washington.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statements of importations of goods in American and foreign vessels, from the 1st October, 1810, to the 30th September, 1811.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, a committee was appointed to inquire if any, and if any what, amendments are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act to provide for the government of the Territory of Missouri;" and Mr. HEMPSTEAD, Mr. MCKEE, Mr. RHEA, Mr. BARNETT, and Mr. ROBERTSON, were appointed the committee.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the order of the day, relating to this subject, when

Mr. TROUP concluded the observations he yesterday commenced in favor of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, with a view of proposing certain amendments to the bill, moved that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole; which motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole accordingly.

Mr. WILLIAMS then moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "twenty regiments," and inserting "such number of regiments, not exceeding twenty, as may, in the opinion of the President, be necessary to the public service."

Mr. W. said, the amendment he had proposed was of such a nature as required but a very few words to explain. By those who recollected the former course of his arguments, it would be remembered that he had stated that this force was intended not only for the defence of the country, but for filling up the deficiency of our present regiments. The bill goes to repeal your present laws authorizing the acceptance of volunteers, while the act authorizing the President to raise 50,000 men in one way is to be substituted by this bill, authorizing 20,000 men in another. As, however, under those acts, certain corps had been accepted, (with the amount of which he was not acquainted,) it was not the disposition of the Military Committee, or of those who manage our military affairs, to ask for a greater force than was necessary; and therefore he wished to give the Executive a discretion not to raise so great a force, as proposed by this bill, by so many volunteers as may now be in service. For instance, if 10,000 volunteers should appear to be in service, under the volunteer acts, it might be advisable not to raise, of the force proposed by this bill, more than 10,000 men.

Mr. WILLIAMS's motion was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. FITCH moved to strike out the fourth section of the bill, giving to the President the appointment of all officers under the rank of Colonel.—Motion lost.

Mr. M. CLAY then made a motion to strike out one year, (the time of enlistment,) and insert three years.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke at length in support of this motion. He was in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, for which he did not think this description of force calculated.

Mr. FINDLEY and Mr. WILLIAMS replied to Mr. LOWNDES.

The motion of Mr. CLAY was negatived by a large majority—15 or 20 only rising in favor of it.

JANUARY, 1813.

Mr. BLEECKER.—Mr. Chairman: I have a very few, very desultory, and I fear very unimportant observations to make on the subject now before the Committee. They will be few, not because the subject does not abound with various fruitful and interesting topics, but because an indisposition of some days has unfitted me for any considerable effort of memory.

I was opposed to the war when it was declared, because I was confidently persuaded that the evils of which we complained were of a nature not to be remedied by war. I thought, too, sir, that by entering into war, we were plunging ourselves into evils a million fold greater than those from which we sought to be relieved. I was opposed to the war, because I thought that, notwithstanding all the decrees and orders of the belligerents affecting our neutral rights, we might enjoy a commerce more extensive and profitable than we could have in a time of European peace. The war in Europe was, in fact, a blessing to this country. I was opposed to the war, because I knew that the whole of one of the great political parties in the Northern and Eastern, the most commercial section of the country, which was most interested in the avowed objects of the war, openly condemned it; and I believed that a great portion of the other party was secretly opposed to it. This objection was to my mind perfectly conclusive. If there had been no other reason against the war, this was enough. What, sir, go to war when that part of the country which has most of its wealth, strength, and resources, is decidedly opposed to it! go to war for commercial and maritime rights, when the people of that part of the country which is principally interested in its commerce and navigation, openly execrate war!

It seemed to me that it became legislators who were disposed to exercise a paternal regard over the interests of the nation, to give up their own opinions, their prejudices and partialities, rather than go to war with a people thus divided. And permit me to say, sir, without any disparagement to the members of this House, that thousands and tens of thousands of the inhabitants of that part of the country of which I have been speaking, are as competent to understand the true interest and honor of the nation, as gentlemen who happen to be members of Congress.

I was opposed to the war, because I thought it might expose our happy form of Government—our excellent political institutions—to a dangerous trial. I was afraid, sir, that the war might produce a pressure upon the Government which it would not be able to sustain. I was opposed to the war, and this was the bitter draught, because it brought us into concert and co-operation with the great destroyer, the grand enemy of freedom and humanity throughout the world. I was opposed to the war, because I believed the state of things in Europe, out of which our difficulties arose—a state of things which the United States had no power to control—was in its nature transient. Rather than plunge ourselves into the vortex of European politics; rather than encourter the evils and dangers of war, I thought it would be wise and prudent to wait until "the troubled waters should subside, and the ancient landmarks of the world reappear above the flood;" with a living statesman, I thought I saw in the very cloud which blackened all our horizon, the bow which was set for a token, that the tempest would not be forever.

But, sir, war was declared, and the doctrine has since been promulgated, that it is now the duty of every man to support it; that all inquiry must be hushed, and all examination of its expediency and propriety cease. So far as this doctrine inculcates obedience to the laws, it has my cordial approbation; but inasmuch as it denies the right of the citizen to examine into the causes of the war, to express and publish his opinions respecting its policy, it is an insult to the understanding of an intelligent people, and inconsistent with the character and spirit of the Constitution. War is declared by law. How shall the law be repealed? How can we get rid of the war, if we may not say that it is inexpedient, impolitic, and ruinous? How abominable the doctrine is, that the declaration of war shuts the door against all inquiry, is manifest from the consideration, that it would enable a wicked Administration to perpetuate its power by declaring war. Again, sir, I would ask the advocates of the doctrine I am reproaching, when will it be proper to show the folly and ruinous consequences of the war? Suppose the war to have continued five or ten years, and the country to be impoverished, its commerce annihilated, its resources exhausted, its best blood expended in wild and fruitless projects of conquest, the people oppressed by debts and taxes, will it then be deemed improper to expose the absurdity and mischief of continuing the war? Surely, sir, it will be patriotic and laudable to alarm the people, to entreat them to put an end to that which is the cause of their calamities. And if such conduct will then be proper, it must be laudable and patriotic now to show them their evils and dangers, and to point them to the means of escape.

But, sir, what has been the state of the country since the declaration of war? I speak again in reference to public opinion. The people of the North and East have poured out their feelings and opinions, their complaints and groans, in addresses, petitions, resolutions, and remonstrances against the war. Look, sir, at the Presidential election, and you see all the Northern and Eastern States, with the exception of Vermont, arrayed against the Administration. You see the people disregarding the old line of party division and distinction. Yes, sir, in spite of such division and distinction, "burying their mutual animosities," their ancient prejudices, "in their common detestation" of the policy of the Government, rising up in their might and strength to manifest their hostility to the course of measures it has pursued. This, Mr. Chairman, is a state of things which ought to arrest the attention, and engage the reflection of the National Legislature, for without that section of country our strength is weakness. I know how ungracious and invidious topics of this kind are to some gentlemen. But, sir, we cannot help it that the country is made up of sections. We are legislating for such a country, and it is our business and duty to regard the circumstances, the interests, and feelings of the people of different parts of the Union. We declared war for commerce; the people most interested in commerce were opposed to it. We continue the war for sailors' rights, and three-fourths of our native American seamen belong to New York and the Eastern States, the people of which are sighing for peace. It ought to be remembered, too, sir, that the war itself must have the effect of driving a vast portion of our sailors out of the country into foreign service.

But, Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been the reasons for declaring war, the question is not now what it was when war was declared. Our relations with the belligerents have materially and essentially changed. So much have they changed, that I declare, without fear of contradiction, that had they been on the 17th of June last what they now are, we should not have gone to war. I hope no gentleman of this Committee will deny this. But if any gentleman should deny it, the nation will not believe him. Sir, we have received new, important, and interesting evidence of the true state of our foreign relations since the declaration of war. Facts which were then unknown, and which have shed a flood of light upon the situation and policy of the United States, have since been published to the world. The repeal of the Orders in Council itself, by removing the principal cause of the war, has produced a most material change; for had they been repealed before the war was declared, there would have been no war; and let it be remembered, that they were repealed before the war was known in England. But this is not all to which I refer. I mean to speak of the evidence we have received respecting our relations with France; and I hope gentlemen will not be startled or offended by what I am about to say. I declare confidently and boldly that Napoleon has inveigled us into the war. He has cajoled and deceived us. But for his arts, intrigues, and duplicity, the United States would not now have been at war with Great Britain. Yes, sir, he has led us on step by step, until he brought us to the edge of the precipice, and plunged us into the abyss. We have been humbled and mortified. He has triumphed over our character, our honor, our rights, our independence. I do not say these things hastily, carelessly, or lightly. And I will add that after the discovery of the deceit and duplicity which the Emperor of France has practised upon us, it became the duty of this Government to go back to the ground it occupied before the President's proclamation of November, 1810, or to declare immediate war against France. A proper regard to the honor, the character, and independence of the country, demanded this of its Government.

Sir, the proof of what I have said, is plain; and it is time that it be stated here, and spread before the nation. I beg the attention of the Committee to the facts on which it rests. I need not go back farther than to the law of May, 1810, which provided that the non-intercourse act should cease, as to that belligerent which should first repeal its decrees, violating our neutral rights, and that it should operate on the other, which should fail so to do, within three months after the President's proclamation of the fact of such repeal. This law, and the conduct of the President under it, are the immediate cause of the war, and the present unhappy state of the country. On the 5th of August, 1810, the Duke de Cadore wrote his famous letter to General Armstrong, the American Minister in Paris, stating that the Berlin and Milan decrees would, upon certain conditions, cease on the first of November then next. On the authority of this letter, the President of the United States issued his proclamation, declaring the fact, that the French decrees were repealed. But the British Government, not considering the letter of the Duke de Cadore sufficient evidence of their repeal, did not revoke their Orders in Council, and, in consequence, our non-intercourse act went into operation against Great Britain, the February following. Notwithstanding the proclamation of the President, great doubts existed in this country, whether the French decrees were in fact repealed. To remove these doubts, to confirm the proclamation, to prevent inquiry and investigation in the judicial tribunals of the country, the act of March, 1811, was passed. Yet, sir, it has ever since been denied, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were repealed. The public prints have teemed, and the tables of this House have been loaded with the proofs of their existence and execution. You remember, sir, an impressive argument, in many respects original, an unanswered and unanswerable argument of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) on this subject in this House, towards the close of the last session. But, sir, notwithstanding all this, this Government persisted in declaring, that the French decrees were repealed. I do not mean to discuss that stale matter. The statement I make is necessary to my present purpose. The question of their repeal, was the subject of a very voluminous and long-continued correspondence between Mr. Foster, the British Minister, and our Secretary of State. The discussion, I believe, was protracted to the last moment of peace. War was declared on the 18th of June. Some weeks afterwards, appeared in this country a decree of Napoleon, issued in May last, and bearing date the 28th of April, 1811. This is an extraordinary paper, and deserves some attention. I will read it:

"APRIL 28, 1813.

"Napoleon, Emperor of the French, &c.

"On the report of our Minister of Foreign Relations:

"Seeing, by a law passed 2d March, 1811, the Congress has ordered the execution of the provisions of the act of non-intercourse, which prohibits the vessels and merchandise of Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies, from entering the ports of the United States.

"Considering that the said law is an act of resistance to the arbitrary pretensions consecrated by the British Orders in Council, and a formal refusal to adhere to a system invading the independence of neutral Powers and of their flag; we have ordered, and do decree, as follows :

"The decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date, from 1st November last, considered as not existing in regard to American vessels."

Now, sir, did this decree exist at the time of its date? No, sir, the date is false. If the decree existed in April, 1811, why was it not communicated to this nation, the only one interested in the subject? Why was it not communicated to Mr. Russell, who so strongly urged upon the French Government the necessity of furnishing some evidence of the repeal of the decrees. For the purpose of communicating some satisfactory information on that subject to this country, he detained the John Adams in France, in July, 1811. You will remember Napoleon's decree is dated in April. Permit me here to read a passage of Mr. Russell's letter to Mr. Monroe, dated the 15th of July, 1811.

"On the 14th of June, Mr. Hamilton, of the John Adams, reached Paris, and informed me that this vessel had arrived at Cherbourg. Unwilling to close my despatches by her, without being able to communicate something of a more definite and satisfactory character, than anything which had hitherto transpired, I immediately called at the Office of Foreign Relations, but, the Minister being at St. Cloud, I was obliged to postpone the interview which I sought until the Tuesday following. At this interview, I stated to him the arrival of the frigate, and my solicitude to transmit by her to the United States, some act of this Government, justifying the expectation with which the important law which she had brought hither had, undoubtedly, been passed."

After Mr. Russell had left Paris, he wrote from England to Mr. Barlow, who succeeded him, "for additional proofs of the removal of the decrees." Mr. Barlow seems to be very anxious "to get the treaty through, carrying an unequivocal stipulation, that shall lay that question to rest."

But it was all in vain; no authentic evidence of the repeal was furnished. This decree did not exist; and why was it not issued? Why was the evidence of the repeal of the decrees withheld? The answer is obvious. The United States were not yet committed to go to war with Great Britain. Napoleon knew very well that when proper evidence of the repeal of his decrees was furnished, the English Orders in Council would be repealed, and the United States would not go to war with Great Britain. For, sir, he knew very well, and we know very well, that for the subject of impressments alone, this country would not go to war. It cannot be denied, that for this cause, we should not have declared war. This Government has never been disposed to go to war on that ground alone. The present President of the United States made an arrangement with Mr. Erskine, which gladdened the heart of every man in the nation, without any provision on that subject, without any mention of it; and there was not a murmur in the country, on account of its omission. Mr. Pinkney, too, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) yesterday, again and again, offered to accommodate with England, on the rescinding of the Orders in Council, without any reference to impressments.

Sir, this decree itself is an insult to this Government. It is issued expressly, because we had taken our stand against England; it is declared to be issued in consequence of our act of March, 1811, when, in fact, the President's proclamation and the act of March were founded on the repeal of the decrees. To show the correctness of my remarks on this part of the subject; to show that Napoleon has triumphed over our honor and character, I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee to Mr. Russell's letter to Mr. Monroe, dated the 9th of June, 1811. His language does credit to his understanding and feelings:

"To have waited for the receipt of the proclamation, in order to make use of it for the liberation of the New Orleans Packet, appeared to me a preposterous and unworthy course of proceeding, and to be nothing better than absurdly and basely employing the declaration of the President, that the Berlin and Milan decrees had been revoked, as the means of obtaining their revocation. I believed it became me to take higher ground, and without confining myself to the mode best calculated to recover the property, to pursue that which the dignity of the American Government required.

"A crisis, in my opinion, presented itself, which was to decide whether the French edicts were retracted as a preliminary to the execution of our law; or whether, by the non-performance of one party, and the prompt performance of the other, the order in which these measures ought to stand was to be reversed, and the American Government shuffled into the lead, where national honor and the law required it to follow."

It would have been base to have employed the President's proclamation, that the Berlin and Milan decrees had been revoked as the means of obtaining their revocation. But what, sir, is the price we have at length paid for their repeal? The President's proclamation was not enough; the act of March added to it was not enough; we could not procure the revocation till we went to war. For, sir, the Emperor would not issue this decree till he knew that we were pledged and committed to go to war with Great Britain. How he knew this, sir, it is not for me to say. We all know, however, that he had all the acts of this Government to satisfy him of the course we were pursuing—the step we were about to take. He had the President's Message, the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the war speeches of the members of this House, the laws for raising armies, and the embargo. In the month of May, then, when the policy of this country in relation to Great Britain was settled, he issues his decree, just in such time, too, sir, that it could not reach this country till we had plunged into the war.

H. OF R.

And well, in such a state, might he repeal his decrees, which, by the war itself, would be superseded—would become a nullity.

Thus, sir, believing the French decrees to be repealed, we departed from our neutral stand by enforcing the non-intercourse law against Great Britain. We have in vain waited for such evidence of their repeal as would have induced Great Britain to rescind her Orders in Council—the great cause of the war. Their revocation depended upon the repeal of the French decrees; and had they been revoked, there would have been no war between the United States and Great Britain. The decree, declaring the edicts of France to be revoked, is at length issued, when the Emperor knows it is too late to prevent the war. The decree is communicated to the English Government, the Orders in Council are revoked on the ground of the repeal of the French decrees, but the United States have declared war. How, sir, can I make this matter plainer? Our whole course against Great Britain has proceeded from the belief of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees; but that evidence of their repeal, which would have stopped our course, by means of which the Orders in Council would have been revoked, and the war would have been avoided, is withheld till the Emperor knows that war is inevitable. Thus, sir, have we been duped, deceived, and inveigled.

I repeat it, sir, had we, on the 17th June, understood our foreign relations as we now understand them, we should not have declared war. And would it not have been just and magnanimous in this Government, when all doubt was removed on the subject of the French decrees, to have acknowledged its error? Did not the honor, the character, the independence of the country require of us to go back to our original neutral ground? I rose principally for the purpose of presenting this view of the arts and deceit of the French Emperor to the Committee. I regret that I have not done it more fully and clearly; and I hope that some gentleman more competent to a proper examination of the subject will yet take it up before we get through this discussion.

But, Mr. Chairman, why shall we continue the war against Great Britain? The subject of impressments is now the only remaining cause of war; and is war a remedy for the evil of which we complain? So far from it, sir, I believe the war itself will be the means of putting the object of it farther out of our reach.

What, sir, is the subject of impressment? What is the nature and history of that which is now the only matter of dispute between the United States and Great Britain? When the war broke out between France and England in 1793, the profits of our neutrality and extensive commerce enabled us to pay much higher wages to seamen than Great Britain could afford to give. The United States had not many years before been severed from the British empire. We were a people speaking the same language, having the same habits and appearance, and engaged in the same pursuits. The high wages we paid, and the advantages and safety of employment on board of neutral vessels, of course tempted thousands of British seamen to flock into our service. Great Britain complained of this as a very serious evil. We have done nothing to prevent it. Let us consider this matter candidly and fairly. Great Britain says that she is fighting for her existence; that her seamen are essential to her defence. We seduce them into our employment by higher wages and more desirable service. We are neutral, she is at war. We employ her seamen for our profit, she wants them for her defence. By the temptations our service holds out she loses many thousand of those subjects, whose service she considers essential to her national existence. We acknowledge that she sustains great injury, but do nothing to prevent it. So far we give occasion to the complaint; as we do not prohibit the employment of her seamen, the injury begins with us. How is she to redress herself? What means has she but impressment? When I entice away your servant or apprentice by an offer of higher wages, or other advantages, the common law gives you an action for damages against me. This is dictated by natural justice. The case is in some respects like the one which is now the cause of dispute between us and Great Britain. Is it not reasonable and just that we do all that can be done to prevent the injury of which she complains?

She founds her claim to the services of her seamen on the doctrine maintained by the nations of Europe, "that their subjects have no 'right to expatriate themselves, and that the nation has, in time of war, a right to the services 'of all its citizens.'"

That a man has no right to expatriate himself, is the doctrine of the common law of England, the country from which we derive our notions of law. It must be the law of most of the United States; certainly of all those that have by their Constitutions expressly recognised and adopted the common law of England, which many of them have done. I believe, sir, I may say, that it is the law of the United States; one of the ablest and most distinguished judges we have ever had in our courts,* solemnly decided, that such was the law of the United States and the Supreme Court has, I think, on questions relating to the descent of lands, decided, what appears to me, involves the same doctrine. Now, sir, if this be so, if the doctrine on which England founds her claim, be also the law of this country, are we to contend for the right of expatriation? If the law be as I have stated, it would seem to follow, that all other allegiance must be subordinate to that which a man owes to his natural sovereign—to the country that gave him birth: And what then is the effect of our naturalization law? When a foreigner comes here and asks the benefit of it, we do not inquire into the obligations he may be under to another country. If he chooses to embarrass himself with contradictory and inconsistent obligations, that is his own concern.

JANUARY, 1813.

We protect him here, we treat him as a citizen, but I do not know that we can abrogate his prior obligations. Some of our most distinguished citizens, some years ago, became citizens of France, but were they thereby discharged from their duty of allegiance to this their native country? Whether the doctrine of non-expatriation is right in the abstract or not, I know not, I care not. Practical men have nothing to do with abstract questions. They must take things as they are, and attain all the good within their power. But is this doctrine so unreasonable as it is sometimes supposed to be? It does not prohibit emigration. If a man thinks that he can obtain a better subsistence, that he can improve his condition by removing from his native country, he may leave it and seek for "fairer fields and a more congenial clime," but he retains the privileges and remains subject to the duties of his natural allegiance. On this subject of impressment, sir, I have always had all the sensibility which its nature deserves. The sensibility prevailing in the country from the impressment of American seamen is natural and proper. I do not wish to diminish it. And, sir, I applaud our Government for insisting, that in any arrangement made respecting this subject, the practice of searching our vessels for seamen shall be relinquished on the part of Great Britain. Not, sir, from any consideration of abstract right, nor for the purpose of protecting British seamen, but because it affords the best security for our native seamen, against the abuse and indignity to which they must be exposed as long as the practice of impressment continues. Yet, sir, I would not expose the country to the calamities of war on this account. I would not go to Canada, because I do not believe that you will secure the immunity of your flag as to seamen by such means. I would protest against the pretensions and practice of Great Britain, with respect to impressments on board of our ships on the high seas, and wait till we are able to enforce our rights.

But after all, Mr. Chairman, what is the extent of the evils, and how stands the account between us and Great Britain? In the whole period of the European war, according to the statement furnished by the Secretary of State, six thousand two hundred and fifty-eight seamen have been impressed from American vessels. This includes persons of all nations, Danes, Swedes, Germans, Dutch, &c. All but one thousand five hundred have been discharged. Probably at no one time have more than one thousand five hundred, or, at the utmost, two thousand men, including British subjects, impressed from American vessels, been employed in the British service. And it will be remembered, that not long before war was declared, the British Minister offered to restore all American seamen that had been impressed.

We are supposed to have in our service one hundred and twenty thousand seamen—of these, from ten to fifteen thousand, at least, are supposed to be British subjects. So, sir, it appears that the complaints of Great Britain on this subject are not unfounded, nor unreasonable.

It is somewhat strange, sir, that though three-fourths of the native American sailors belong to New York and the Eastern States, yet these States are forced into the war by the people of the Western States, who have no sailors, who have never seen a sailor.

But, sir, will the evil of which we complain be remedied by the means proposed? Sailors' rights are the object—the conquest of Canada the means. Will Great Britain yield to you when you have conquered Canada? What is Canada to her? It contributes nothing to her strength, nor will the conquest diminish her means of annoying us. It will rouse all her pride, and make her more inflexible than ever with respect to what she considers her maritime rights. I ask, sir, wherefore is the conquest and possession of the country desirable to us? If Great Britain were now willing to surrender it to us, I would give my vote against accepting it. It would be a curse to us. Our territory is already too extensive. The Union is already composed of too jarring materials. Why increase them? The Government is already pressed by a weight it can hardly bear; why add to it? Will Canada compensate us for New York and New Orleans? For our ravaged coast; for the millions upon millions which will be annually lost by the annihilation of our commerce in consequence of the war? Sir, the amount we lose by having our ports shut up for six months, is worth more to us than all Canada. You cannot conquer it without a vast expense of blood and treasure, without bringing upon the people an enormous load of debt and taxes. If the conquest can be accomplished, it will require vastly more time, force, and expense than gentlemen imagine.

But, sir, shall we succeed in the attempt? Will the project of the Committee on Military Affairs afford us the means of success? And here, I differ with some of my friends on this side of the House. I do not believe so much in our ability to conquer Canada as some gentlemen seem to do. The physical force of the nation, and the means of exerting that force, are very different things. We were told in this House in the month of May last, that in six weeks after the declaration of war, we should be in possession of the whole of the upper, and a great part of the lower province of Canada. I did not believe a word of it. I thought that it would have been more reasonable to have spoken of six years for the conquest. I did not believe that we should, in the then next campaign, get possession of an inch of the country. It is now proposed to send a force of twenty thousand men into Canada, and this force is to make the conquest the next campaign. I do not think it competent to the object. Sir, you will again be defeated. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs (Mr. WILLIAMS) supposes, that there are twelve thousand regular troops in Canada besides militia, making a force together of eighteen thousand men. We are to invade the country with twenty thousand raw, undisciplined troops. We have the disadvantage of being invaders, the enemy receives us in his own country—great advantages, of course, are on his side. From the disaffection of the inhabitants we have nothing to hope. The events of the war have strengthened their loyalty. But, sir, will you be prepared in the Spring to send into Canada the force contemplated by the Committee on Military Affairs? Of the amount of our present force, as it seems to be considered incorrect to speak of it, I will say nothing. It is probable, however, that it will decrease as much during the winter, by deaths and otherwise, as it will increase by enlistments. But, sir, can we raise the force contemplated? The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs (Mr. WILLIAMS) tells us that the patriotism of the country is commensurate with its population. But let me tell him, sir, and I do not mean to say anything offensive, that it does not become men who manage the affairs of a nation to talk in this manner of raising armies from the patriotism of the country. Patriotism is not the inducement to enlistment. Patriots do not become soldiers. Armies in all countries, except under very extraordinary circumstances, are composed of a certain description of population, of men who have no regular occupation; the idle, the dissolute, the vagrant and profligate. Of this sort of population, there is a certain amount in every country—in this, there is less than in any other. We have heard much of the opposition to the war; but that has not been the cause of our failures and disasters. It is not because the Governors of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, refused to call out their militia that the war has hitherto been unsuccessful; nor is it because the war is unpopular, or because the people are divided on that subject, that the ranks of the army have not been filled up. Men who enlist, do not inquire into the causes and expediency of the war—they take no cognizance of such matters. It is owing to that for which our bosoms ought to swell with gratitude to Heaven—the happy state of our country, the comfortable condition of the people, the facility of procuring subsistence. It seems to me, sir, that if patriotism alone would make soldiers, several members of this House ought to have enlisted; for there has been a greater display of patriotism in this House in relation to the war, than in all the rest of the nation, from one end of the country to the other. But, sir, it is more agreeable and convenient to gentlemen to be here, than to be in the army as common soldiers. Just so, the people of the country who are comfortable at home, think it more agreeable and convenient to stay there. I know, sir, that some honorable gentlemen have shouldered their muskets and gone into the militia. This, sir, as an evidence of their zeal, was laudable, (I do not mean to speak disparagingly of those gentlemen,) but in reference to any efficient service, it was worse than useless; for assemblages of militia-men will do no essential service. They are no better, I think, to use the language of the Father of his Country, than “armed mobs.” And the war has served to destroy the illusion which has so long been kept up in the country by the many strange and absurd things which have been said of the importance and efficiency of the militia. Sir, it is all idle—the militiaman is best employed at his plough, and in the other occupations of life, in which industry can be successfully exerted. For the real strength of the country—its wealth, the sinews of war—arise from the produce of the various branches of industry. This furnishes the means of supporting an army; but the army itself must be composed of idle, dissolute, and disorderly persons. And if the country and state of society are so happy as not to afford a sufficient number of these, you cannot get an army; and if you cannot get an army, you cannot go to war.

In considering the probable issue of the contest in which we have embarked it is well to compare our power with that of the enemy—to inquire whether our population, our wealth, our resources, our ability to endure the privations, losses, and calamities of war, are equal to those of the nation with which we are at war. Now, sir, in all these points, Great Britain has the advantage of us. In the means of annoyance, she is much superior. And let it be remembered, sir, that the war has not yet begun on her part. It is true that she may lose the benefit of the trade of this country, which, to a certain portion of her people, is very important, but to the Government itself, as a source of revenue, it is of little consequence. It does not amount to the one-hundredth part of her annual expenditure. I believe the restrictive system was a more reasonable means of coercing her than the war will prove to be. Yet we found that to be inefficient—we found that she could endure the embargo better and longer than the people of this country could or would endure it; and to the purposes of the Government, it is the same thing whether they cannot or will not bear such a policy. Its self-infliction is such, that it cannot be continued for any length of time. A word more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. We have nothing to gain and much to lose by the contest in which we are engaged.

Sir, it is time to pause. In the events of this contest, our hopes and destinies may be involved. What a scene does this country now present! Suffering the evils and privations of war—voluntarily abandoning a commerce greater than could be enjoyed in a time of European peace—giving up the means of growing rich beyond the dreams of national avarice—rejecting blessings such as the Almighty disposer of events has never put within the reach of any other people. At war for commerce, yet abandoning all commerce, except the export trade, which is held by the license of the enemy and the fears of the National Legislature. At war for commercial and maritime rights, yet smiting the commerce and navigation of the country with consumption, with blasting, and with mildew. At war for sailors' rights, yet driving three-fourths of its sailors out of the country, into the vessels of the enemy, perhaps to shed the blood of their countrymen, or to fall by the hands of their brethren. Spurning

I would call upon the nation to pause—I would call upon patriotic, enlightened, and honorable men to ponder on the present state, and to think of the future destinies of the country. I would entreat them to “stand in the breach and stay the plague.”

Sir, let us cease to thwart and oppose our high destinies—let us not blast our exalted hopes—let us not jeopardize our liberty, our privileges, our happy form of Government, our precious institutions. Let us wait till the calamities of Europe—till “the little brief authority” of the kings and princes of yesterday, of “pinchbeck potentates and sceptered parasites,” shall have passed away. For “the tyranny of France will pass away, like a fearful dream, with the sudden crumbling and division of the power which upholds it.” Let us remember that the state of Europe, out of which our difficulties have arisen, depends upon the transitory life of a single individual. Yes, sir, the raging of the storm which agitates the political world, depends upon the breath of a single individual—and nature has decreed that Napoleon must die!

Mr. TALLMADGE said he felt a peculiar embarrassment in rising to offer to the consideration of the Committee some of his own reflections on the important subject now under debate, from a twofold consideration. In the first place, the magnitude of the question might claim the aid of more exalted talents than he pretended to possess, and, therefore, to do it justice, he feared, would not be in his power. For, said Mr. T., in the extensive range of debate which has been permitted by the Chair, the whole field of our foreign relations has been open to examination, and the policy of our own Government in relation to Great Britain has been deemed fairly within the range of discussion.

In the second place, the gentlemen who had preceded have occupied the ground so ably, and discussed the subject so extensively, that it was somewhat difficult to present arguments entirely novel to arrest the attention of the Committee. Having a belief, however, that there were some important considerations, in relation to the bill now under debate, which had not yet been brought into view, he begged the attention of the Committee while he endeavored to lay before them the views which he had taken of the subject, and which constrained him most decidedly to oppose the passage of the bill.

Before I enter upon the merits of the subject, said Mr. T., I take occasion to express my hearty assent to declarations made by honorable gentlemen that this is no time to indulge the bickerings of party; and that it is greatly to be desired that all distinctions of this sort were entirely laid aside and forgotten. Sir, I should consider it the most auspicious event of my life if I could see every gentleman on this floor determined to take and maintain the true old American ground occupied by the patriots of '76. Although it may be painful to the feelings of an honorable mind to be assailed with odious appellations, and charged with duplicity and falsehood, yet the mind which has virtue for its basis, a conscious integrity for its support, and firmness sufficient to enable the man to do his duty, may hope to pass unhurt by such malicious darts.

Standing, as I do, in the highly-responsible situation of one of the legislators of this extensive country, I hope to have stability and integrity sufficient to enable me to discharge my duty to my constituents. If, after having passed through the Revolutionary war, and having never changed my political creed to the present day, an odious epithet could induce me to alter my course, I should be unworthy the confidence of my country. But whence, Mr. Chairman, proceeds this system of slander and abuse? From the foul presses of our country. To whom are some of the fairest characters which have ever adorned this or any other country indebted for the odious epithets of monarchists, foreign agents, Tories, and the like? To your imported patriots, who, weary of the dull pursuits of industry on their native soil or escaping from the justice of the laws of their own country, have fled to this happy land to instruct its inhabitants in the true principles of liberty and equality.

To this set of newly fledged politicians, and men of a similar stamp, is this once happy country indebted for one half the miseries and much of the disgrace which it suffers.

I have been led into this digression in consequence of remarks which have fallen from the other side of the House, but will now return to my subject.

A gentleman from New York, (Mr. Stow,) who addressed you early in this debate, told us that he reprobated the war, and had no confidence in the Administration to conduct it to a successful issue, but should vote for the bill to enable them to carry it on. This is strange political logic to my understanding. While I subscribe fully to his premises, the reasonings of my mind bring me to a very different result. Because I deprecate this war as pregnant with great evils, if not ruin to my country, I will, therefore, take all Constitutional measures to bring it to a speedy and honorable close; and because I have no confidence in the Executive department of our Government, nor in the subordinate agents who have been appointed to vote for this bill, which, if adopted, will entail still greater evils on this devoted country.

In presenting the subject to this honorable Committee, in its most appropriate form, it may be proper to examine into the prominent causes of our dispute, which has terminated in open war with Great Britain. These I take to be three, viz:

1. The Orders in Council.
2. Impressment of our seamen.
3. The attack upon the Chesapeake.

That we may narrow the point in controversy as much as possible, I remark that ample and satisfactory atonement having been made for the violation of our rights by the attack on the Chesapeake, one cause of disquietude, and a prominent one too, has been finally removed. It has, indeed, been frequently remarked on this floor, that the satisfaction offered for the unauthorized attack on the frigate Chesapeake was long delayed, and very reluctantly offered. However painful it may be to censure the conduct of our own Government, yet a sense of justice obliges me to say, that to every overture made by Great Britain to accommodate this unpleasant affair, our Administration attached some exceptionable condition which closed the door to an amicable adjustment. The Committee cannot have forgotten the early disavowal of this wanton aggression on the honor of our flag by the British Government, and the tender of satisfaction which was made, but failed, because our Minister was instructed to couple with this complaint the subject of impressment; nor can they have forgotten how indignant the Ministry and nation were when the President assumed the right of judging what would best comport with the honor of their King. Few, I believe, who read the offensive remark, expected a different result from that which ensued. And while I am upon this subject I take occasion to remark, that in all our attempts to negotiate with the British Government there seems to have been some untoward circumstance, some unfortunate condition, either accidentally or intentionally, attached to the question at issue, which has defeated the negotiation.

It would be within the scope of my present plan to take a particular review of the British Orders in Council, as well as the subject of impressments. But inasmuch as the documents relating to those two subjects have been laid on every gentleman's table; and more especially when I reflect that both topics have been very ably discussed by some gentlemen who have preceded me, and especially by the gentleman who has just sat down, (Mr. BLEECKER,) I shall content myself with taking but a brief review of these prominent, and I may add, the only remaining causes for the present war. As to the Orders in Council, it ought not to be forgotten, that during several lengthy discussions to obtain their repeal, as well by our Ministers in London, as at this place, they have been considered as the prominent point in dispute. So, again, as to the origin of our restrictive system; it cannot be forgotten that the friends and abettors of those measures uniformly professed that they were adopted as retaliatory for the Orders in Council. From the first partial non-importation act, which passed on the eighteenth of April, 1806, down to the law of the second of March, 1811, the object has been, on the very face of the law, to procure a repeal of the Orders in Council, and of the Berlin and Milan decrees. If any doubt should remain on the mind of any member of this Committee, as to this fact, I beg him to turn his eye to the restrictive code, and I presume he will find the evidence to be abundant and complete. In this system of anti-commercial regulations, I find the origin and progress of our present political calamities. And here, Mr. Chairman, I shall readily admit, that we had grievances and complaints, great and heavy, against both of the belligerents; nor have I the least inclination to palliate or excuse them. My object is to show, what I have uniformly expressed on this floor, that our system of non-importation, non-intercourse, and embargo, have been directed against the Orders in Council, as to Great Britain, and nothing else; and finally have brought this country into a ruinous war. Is there a man within these walls, who does not now believe (as was fully predicted when the law passed) that the conditions held out to the two great belligerents, to induce them to repeal their obnoxious edicts, violating the neutral commerce of the United States, placed the execution of our law in the hands of a foreign Government? Is there a man of ordinary capacity in the United States, having the means of information, who now believes that the Berlin and Milan decrees were repealed on the 1st November, 1810, according to the proclamation of the President of the United States, solemnly announcing that fact; and that they thenceforward ceased to violate our neutral commerce? Does not candor constrain all to confess that, long after the pretended repeal of the aforesaid decrees, our commerce was harassed in every sea where French cruisers could reach it? Need I point you to the piratical seizures and burning of American property in the Baltic, the Mediterranean and the Atlantic seas, by the privateers and fleets of the French Empire; subsequent to this pretended repeal, and sanctioned expressly by its authority? If all other evidence should be deemed insufficient, I inquire whether the French Emperor himself has not sufficiently humbled this country (if indeed our cup of humiliation had not been full before) by his own formal, ante-dated repeal of his Berlin and Milan decrees, long subsequent to the time imposed on the President by the Duke of Cadore?

It cannot have escaped the attention of the Committee, or of the nation, that Napoleon's decree, respecting the Berlin and Milan decrees, bears date the 28th of April, 1811, and is explicitly bottomed on the law of Congress passed March 2, 1811; the sole object of which law was to confirm the proclamation of the President which had then been issued more than four months, and the legality of which had become very questionable. This decree may be found among the documents accompanying the President's Message of November 4th, 1812, and on the forty-sixth page of those printed papers.

If further evidence should be needed to prove the abominable fraud of this transaction, it may be found in the correspondence of our Minister at Paris, in the Summer of 1811, wherein he remarks, that he had repeatedly demanded evidence of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, but none could be obtained. And yet, forsooth, we are now furnished with a decree dated in April, preceding, but not issued until we were so entangled in French toils, that war with Great Britain was inevitable. If this fact alone had been understood, I put it to the candor of this honorable Committee to say, whether they would have consented to the declaration of war against Great Britain at the time and for the reasons which were given? I say, without fear of contradiction, that they would not. If my premises are true, and the inference undisputed, since the Government has been grossly deceived and drawn into this war, for reasons and causes which did not then exist, most assuredly it becomes our duty as well as interest to relieve the country from its pressure as soon as possible.

In addition to all this, it is a singular fact in the history and progress of this war, that in five days after its declaration, (viz. on the 23d of June, 1812,) and as soon as the aforesaid decree of the French Emperor was made known to the British Ministry by Mr. Russell, an Order in Council was issued, repealing the former obnoxious orders, which had been ostensibly the most prominent cause of the war; and yet the President has never issued his proclamation announcing that fact, as by the terms of the law of March 2d, 1811, he was expressly bound to do. On this failure of the President to do what the law enjoined on him to perform, as well as having issued his proclamation of November, 1810, without possessing the facts required by the law to support him, I make no comment. The account is still unsettled between him and this injured country.

The Orders in Council having thus been revoked, the continuance of the war seems to rest upon the impressment of our seamen alone. Give me leave then to inquire into the grounds of this practice, as claimed by Great Britain. Is it not bottomed on the ancient doctrine of perpetual allegiance—or in other words, that the native-born subject can never so expatriate, as that the mother country may not claim his service in time of war? Is this a novel doctrine, either as to time, or the nation who now attempts to enforce it? I venture to say that Great Britain has practised upon this principle ever since she has been a nation; and it is farther manifest that France, and all the maritime Powers of Europe have maintained the same doctrine. Nay, sir, we maintain the same doctrine in our own country; in proof of which, witness the President's proclamation at the commencement of this war; and notice also the recent case of Clark the spy, who was condemned to suffer death by a court martial, and was pardoned by the President on the ground of his owing allegiance to the United States, although residing in an enemy's territory, and having been naturalized or sworn allegiance to the King of Great Britain. Hence it would seem, that the principle set up was not novel nor singular. But what is the principle in contest between the two Governments? Great Britain claims the right to visit neutral merchant ships on the high seas; and if she finds any of her natural-born subjects, to take them into her service. The Government of the United States denies to her this right, and asserts, that a foreigner naturalized in this country, is absolved from all allegiance to the parent State. The practice of Great Britain under her principle, has undoubtedly subjected some of our native citizens to capture and involuntary service, from causes which I need not here repeat. In all such cases, I take it to be admitted on all hands, that she sets up no claim, and therefore every abuse of this sort is capable of remedy. But on this head I have no hesitation in expressing my unqualified belief, founded on documents which have been laid on our tables, that the list of such impressed seamen is greatly exaggerated. Out of the number six thousand two hundred and fifty-seven of American citizens said to have been impressed, and forming a standing head piece to the list of our grievances, I very much question if five hundred native Americans can be found among them all. The documents lately furnished by the Secretary of State, if carefully examined, will serve very much to substantiate this fact. Many names are there returned who have only forwarded their claims to our Consul at London, and who, very probably, never set foot on American ground. Others again are continued on the list who have been discharged years ago, and others, who have voluntarily engaged in her service.

The question then at issue, I take to be this—Shall the war with Great Britain be continued to oblige her to relinquish the practice of taking from our merchantmen her native British sailors? If we could obtain the principle by continuing the war, I think it can be demonstrated, that it would be injurious to the American seamen to have it so established, inasmuch as it would, by increasing the number of our seamen, necessarily diminish their wages. But, circumstanced as Great Britain is, contending for her existence against the most formidable Power on earth, and resting her last hopes upon her navy, I presume she will never relinquish the principle.

The inquiry has been made, with some solicitude, what will you do with naturalized foreigners? I answer, treat them hospitably, and extend the arm of protection and all the blessings of government to them while they continue within your territorial jurisdiction; but if they leave your territory, and choose to go upon the great highway of nations, the risk and the choice are their own, as will be the peril. Put the case fairly to the yeomanry of our country, and let them understand the subject, that this war is to be carried on for the purpose of protecting foreigners while sailing on the high seas, and I very much incline to the opinion, that they would dismiss the authors of this war from further service, or oblige them soon to bring it to a close. Sir, I will not consent to waste one drop of pure American blood, nor to expend a single dollar, to protect, on the high seas, all the vagabonds of Europe. Valuable as may have been the acquisition in obtaining many great and good men as emigrants from Europe, still I must maintain the opinion, that all the blessings of liberty and domestic government, which are secured to them in common with our native citizens, ought to be an ample compensation. I know it is no easy matter to draw the precise line where protection shall cease; but in a question of such moment as peace or war, the prosperity and happiness, or perhaps the misery and ruin of our country, I cannot hesitate as to the course proper to be pursued.

With respect to protections, they have become so much a matter of bargain and sale, that having been counterfeited and sold in almost every port in Great Britain, as well as in America, they have long since ceased to answer any valuable purpose. It has been a fact long since well established, that a foreigner who could scarcely speak our language, could procure a protection in Great Britain purporting to be evidence of his American citizenship. This then may account for the light and contemptuous treatment given to this species of evidence by the officers of the British navy.

Having thus briefly adverted to the two prominent causes of the present war, the remainder of my remarks will be directed to the provisions of the bill now under discussion, which, should it pass into a law, will increase our Military Establishment to the number of 55,000 men. In fact, sir, when we bring into account several other corps of troops, such as engineers, the mounted rangers, &c., besides 35,000 regular troops, already authorized by law, if all the establishment should be completed, and the present bill should pass, I believe we should not greatly overrate the estimate, if we should consider our military force to be nearly 60,000 men, independent of militia and volunteers. Now, sir, I am wholly averse to such a measure—I am fortified in this opinion, by the declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who asserts, that the former establishment, if completed, would be amply sufficient for all the purposes of the war. I remark then—

1st. That the troops contemplated to be raised by this bill, would be useless to the purpose of offensive war. To enforce the truth of this position, I presume it will be sufficient to remark, that modern warfare has become a sort of trade; that the military life is a school into which men are brought for tuition and instruction; that it requires time to change the habits and pursuits of men, before they can advantageously assume and understand the duties of a soldier; and that, above all, it requires time and discipline to inure them to the fatigues, hardships, and privations of a camp. If gentlemen will review the history of our Revolutionary war, they will find these remarks abundantly verified; and I believe I shall be borne out in the remark, from undoubted evidence, that more of our men perished by disease during the two first years of the war, (the years 1775 and 1776,) than we lost from the same cause through the residue of the war. To what else, but to the causes before mentioned, can this great mortality be ascribed? Men of experience (and I flatter myself that I speak in the hearing of some, who not only recollect the events, but shared in the dangers of the Revolutionary war) know, that the foregoing remarks are substantially true.

2. I observe further that this species of force is altogether more expensive, and less efficient than regular troops. If gentlemen will turn to the instructive letters of General Washington on this subject, they will find my remarks abundantly verified. Very early in the Revolution he pressed upon Congress not to engage troops on short enlistments, but for the war; and supported his opinion by considerations of which the foregoing form a summary.

3. I consider the provisions of this bill altogether inexpedient. What is the present state of your Army? The honorable chairman of the military committee has not furnished this Committee with a statement of our regular force; nor indeed do I think he was in duty bound to have made such an exhibition; but he has said, that if the establishment was complete, the force was sufficient. I say, then, why do you not fill up the regiments now authorized by law? Why should we be called on to authorize an increased Military Establishment, in which, by the confession of its friends, there must be a vast increase of officers whose services will not be wanted, if the other corps are not completed?

But the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) has said, that the regular establishment cannot be completed, but this new body of levy troops can. If this be true, I inquire with solemnity, of the honorable Committee, whether it is not decisive as to the continuance of the war? I speak with great confidence, founded on experience, when I assert, that the war cannot be carried on successfully by militia, by volunteers, nor by troops engaged on short enlistments. If this bill is to be supported because the ranks in your regular army cannot be filled, I say you should begin to think seriously about a peace, or disgrace and discomfiture will be the consequence.

4. I am opposed to this great increase of our Military Establishment, because it is truly anti-republican, and dangerous to the liberties of the people. The history of the world, and the principles of our own Government, call loudly for us not to jeopardize our safety by foreign conquests; for, as this spirit prevails in any country, in the same proportion will be the demand for armies—those engines of despotism. I cannot too strongly reprobate the doctrine of foreign invasion, for the purpose of annexing great districts of country to the territory of the United States. If this spirit is not checked, my fears will be greatly awakened to the safety, if not to the existence of our present happy form of Government, which should not be exposed to so severe a pressure. It surely cannot be amiss to call the attention of those who control the destinies of this country to the situation and views of the Northern States on the subject of this war. That my conscience and my conduct may be without reproach, I take this occasion seriously and solemnly to warn the friends of this bill and of the war, not to proceed with such rash and hasty strides, lest the evils resulting from their measures should be discovered when it is too late.

The history of other nations ought to afford a caution to us, that we do not endanger the liberties of this country by encouraging large Military Establishments. Would it be an unheard-of event, that an ambitious military chief should lead his victorious army to redress their own wrongs? Had the war of the Revolution become so soon forgotten, that its closing scene can make no impression on the minds of our countrymen, or of this House? Have not gentlemen read (or have they forgotten) the inflammatory letters that were published at Newburg, then the head-quarters of the American Army, artfully calculated to arouse the passions and excite the indignation of a suffering army against their country, just emancipated from British oppression? Sir, the solemn and interesting scene rises full to my recollection, and warns me of danger to be apprehended from a similar cause. Never can I forget the sober reflection of some, and the wild and extravagant expressions of many others, produced by those insidious publications to the Army of the Revolution. The war was now brought to a close, and its great object had been obtained. The pay of the Army was greatly in arrears, and that which had been furnished was of very little value. A separation of the troops, without some good prospect of redress to the soldiers, appeared to be the loss of all. At this critical moment, the proposal was made, "not to lay down their arms until their grievances were redressed!" nor could such measures fail to find advocates. While the flames spread with rapidity through the camp, and the efforts of some of our best officers failed to check the impetuous torrent, the Father and Defender of his Country, and the friend of the soldier, now interposed, and threw himself into the breach. Here stood the man who had so often led this veteran band to victory and to glory, conjuring these companions of his toils not to tarnish the splendor of their achievements "by perpetrating the parricidal deed." The triumph was glorious and complete; order and harmony were restored; and the anonymous author of these incendiary addresses retired from the field ashamed and confounded. I have uniformly believed it was not too much to say, that, to the unbounded popularity and influence of that illustrious Chief, "who now sleeps in his humble tomb at Mount Vernon," was the Army then saved from disgrace, and, perhaps, the country from bloodshed and ruin.

5. I object also to this bill, because it is attended with such a wasteful expenditure of national treasure. I fear gentlemen have not sufficiently attended to this circumstance, in their great zeal to conquer Canada. I say, then, that the bounties and premiums alone, as proposed by this bill, amount to the trifling sum of three hundred and sixty thousand dollars! The yearly expense of this Establishment will not fall short of five millions of dollars; and, if you bring into the account the increased wages proposed to be given to the Army, by a bill which lately passed this House, together with the losses and other expenses always attendant on military operations, the annual expenditure will not probably fall short of eight millions of dollars! But, I will not enlarge on this point, as I purpose to treat the general subject of expense more fully under another head.

6. Although I am opposed to the principles of this bill, yet, to the fourth section, I have a particular objection. By the provisions of this section, it is proposed to take from the Senate their Constitutional right of considering the nominations of the President, and transferring the power of appointing all the officers necessary for the troops (the colonels only excepted) to the President alone. To this doctrine of increasing Executive patronage, I beg leave to enter my most solemn protest. By the provisions of this section, you invest the President with the sole power of appointing eleven hundred and twenty commissioned officers, independent of the regimental staff! I ask this honorable Committee, whether they are aware of the dangerous inroads they are thus making upon the principles of our Government, and thus establishing precedents which may be quoted hereafter, to justify other and more dangerous practices? The plea of urgency, the handmaid of usurpation, has sometimes been offered to justify dangerous innovations on fundamental principles in government; but nothing of this sort has been urged to support the section to which I refer. The Senate are now in session, and probably will continue to be until after this Establishment shall be organized.

An argument has been deduced from former practice, and the law of May 28, 1798, has been quoted to prove that the same power was granted to the President then, which is proposed to be given now. If gentlemen will attend to the provisions of that law, they will readily perceive that the powers granted are by no means alike. In 1798, Congress considered this country on the eve of a war with France, and made certain preparations for such an event. Among other measures, they authorized the President of the United States, "in the event of a declaration of war against the United States, or of actual invasion of their territory by a foreign Power," to raise a force not exceeding ten thousand men, and, in the recess of the Senate, to appoint the officers. But, even in this case, the nomination of the field officers was to be submitted to the Senate, for their consideration, at their next meeting. In the case now before us, we are actually at war, and the Senate is in session, so that there is no analogy in the two cases. It has even been urged, as a matter of convenience, that blank commissions could be delivered to the field officers, to be given out as should be found convenient and necessary—a practice which I am by no means disposed to justify. And, while I am upon this part of my argument, I shall take occasion to remark, that I have nothing to ask of the Government for myself, nor for any friend on earth; and, therefore, hope my remarks may be considered as directed to the good of my country, and for the preservation of the principles of the Constitution.

7. I object further to this bill, because I am unwilling to afford any aid to the further prosecution of this ruinous war, every day's continuance of which renders an accommodation more doubtful and difficult. If further progress is made, the angry passions will be excited; conquests will undoubtedly be made, and alliances most probably will be formed, which will jeopardize, if not wholly destroy the fairest prospects of our beloved country. On this last prospect, what patriot can turn his eye but with foreboding anxiety and fears. When I turn my reflections to the fate of the European nations, who have been forced into the war with Great Britain, and then into an alliance with France, and behold them regularly moulded into members of that mighty Empire, subjected to all her privations, and obliged to partake in all her wars of ambition and conquest, I shudder at the prospect before us, and wish to escape before it is too late.

8. But I have another objection to the passage of this bill, which appears to be insurmountable. It is on the score of expense. Have gentlemen suffered themselves seriously to calculate the cost, not only of the present establishment, but of a further continuance of the system recently adopted? In private life, as well as in kingdoms, such provident calculations are always deemed marks of sound wisdom; and why should we except our own country from so important an examination. Let me not be told that this is no time to calculate the cost in dollars and cents, when so great a question is at stake. Sir, the question is a solemn one, and must be answered, and our constituents are entitled to an answer at our hands. Fortunate, indeed, would it have been for our country if this question had been satisfactorily settled before we adopted this, in my opinion, disastrous course.

We are now called upon for a loan of about $20,000,000. If this bill should pass, we shall need at least $8,000,000 more. Add to this the last loan, which, in round numbers, may be called (including Treasury notes) $14,500,000; making a net amount of $42,500,000.

I inquire, then, how is this monstrous account of expenditure to be repaid? Nay, Mr. Chairman, I ask you if there is any provision made to pay even the interest? Our external revenue, which would, in a short time, have discharged the whole of our national debt, by the war on which we have voluntarily entered, is nearly annihilated; so that, from the ordinary revenue on those branches of commerce which are permitted by law, according to Mr. Gallatin's report, we cannot expect an annual receipt into the Treasury of more than two millions and a half of dollars after this year. Our system of internal revenue has long since ceased, and the direct taxes reported at the last session of Congress, for some reason, not explained to the House, are permitted to sleep. The only resort seems to be to loans, as if this fund of individual wealth was inexhaustible. Is it then a fact that this war is to be supported almost exclusively by loans? It becomes a serious inquiry as to the facility of obtaining them. By examining the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be found that from loans and the sale of Treasury notes, there had come into the Treasury, in the year 1812, about thirteen millions of dollars, and that by the sale of the remaining Treasury notes authorized by law, about one million and a half more might be expected to accrue, making in the whole $14,500,000. It will further appear, from the same document, that of the sums already received, there were furnished by individuals about $4,000,000, and, by banks, about $9,000,000.

If the Committee will give me their attention for a few moments longer, I will satisfy them from what parts of our country this money has been furnished. Mr. Gallatin informs us that of the $13,000,000 above-named $12,000,000 of it was furnished north of the Potomac. If this may be considered a standard by which to regulate future loans, it may not be amiss to inquire in what part of the United States the advocates of the war principally reside. Most unquestionably to the south of the Potomac. I inquire further, in what parts of our country have the pledges of life, property, and sacred honor, been most abundantly given to support the war in which we have embarked? The answer is, to the south of this place, and west of the Alleghany mountains. If the sinews of war are to be looked for to the North, and the zeal and patriotism to carry it on is found principally to the South and West, it may be useful for us to learn, first, whether the war has acquired such popularity in the Northern States as to induce the money-holders to loan liberally for its support; and, secondly, whether it will be proper for the Government to offer more than common interest to obtain the money. On the first point, I believe I am warranted in the remark, that the war fever has really abated in the Northern States. The manner in which it has been conducted, the instruments who have been appointed to command and superintend the operations of your armies, and the disgrace which has hitherto attended its operations, have seemed to convince the country, that from such management peace cannot be expected. In fact, sir, it becomes an inquiry of some importance among the yeomanry of the Northern States, why the people of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, should be so much more awake to the capture and suffering of our seafaring brethren than the people of the Atlantic States, in which they reside, or from whence they sail.

As a further evidence that the war has become more and more unpopular, since its declaration, in certain Northern sections of our country, I would turn your attention to the recent elections. Most of the gentlemen north and east of Pennsylvania who voted for the war, are now permitted to retire from public labor, and their places have been filled by men who are the friends of peace and commerce. If the Vermont election should terminate in favor of the war candidates, the election will undoubtedly be a close one; and as the change of parties since last Spring (there being a clear gain of more than three thousand votes to the peace ticket) is manifestly great, the call to the war party from that State is, "Be ye also ready." That the war may become prosperous, it must be in a good degree popular; and I have no hesitation in expressing my full conviction that this is far from being the case in the Northern States. In fact, sir, it is condemned as an impolitic and ruinous measure by almost all men of intelligence in that country.

But I shall be told by the friends of this war, if it is indeed so unpopular, why shall it not be prosecuted, and this bill pass with all its deformities, that our power may the sooner pass into other hands?

To this I answer, that a sense of duty constrains me to warn you of the danger before it is too late; a sense of honor makes me unwilling to have my country and its armies disgraced; and that ardent love of country which prevails in my heart, forbids me to be silent, so long as any hope remains of rescuing it from impending ruin.

I inquire with no common solicitude as to the expenses and operations of the last campaign. If the patience of the Committee was not exhausted, I should deem it useful and proper to inquire into the origin and progress of the Indian war upon our frontiers. We are yet without any official information to justify the first hostile operations which were made upon the Wabash. As if all minor considerations were to be absorbed in the great contest upon which we have entered with Great Britain, the Governor of a Territory commences an offensive war with the savages; sacrifices the lives of many brave men in the field; invites the scalping knife and tomahawk into the peaceful dwellings of the frontier settlements, and expends the treasure of our country to an immense amount without any inquiry into such conduct. In better times, such an act of outrage and devastation, entailing so much misery on our own citizens, would have been examined with a scrutinizing eye. I inquire further, who has authorized the commanding officers of posts to invite the citizens of our country to flock to their standards for the purpose of invading the territory of our enemy? While the Commander-in-Chief of our armies keeps himself aloof from the scenes of action, we find one officer after another issuing proclamation upon proclamation, calling for aid from their friends, and denouncing vengeance upon their foes. As my object, under this head, is only to examine into the expense to be incurred, I inquire how this waste of public treasure is to be justified, and by whom is it authorized? Sir, my full conviction is, that one moiety at least of the expenses of the last campaign has been incurred by volunteers and militia, and, in many instances, wholly unauthorized by law. My object is to point out the evil, that, if possible, a suitable remedy may be applied. Unless something of this sort can be done, we shall expend more treasure in two years than the net expense of the Revolutionary war.

But even admitting these objections to have weight, we must have Canada, say the advocates for the war. It may not be amiss to spend a few moments in examining this question.

1st. As to the benefits to be derived; and

2d. As to the practicability of the object.

I inquire, then, if Canada should be conquered, what benefits would the United States gain by the acquisition? As to the new lands, most assuredly we do not want any more. Can it be desirable to add more territory to our Republic? Before the war was declared, some gentlemen asserted on this floor that the Canadians only waited for the occasion to present, and they would receive us with open arms, and rejoice to participate in the blessings of liberty which our Government would impart. On this subject, distressing experience has taught us the reverse; and if disgrace and discomfiture could make the lesson more impressive, our country will not soon forget it. To lose an army and a territory at a stroke is no common misfortune.

Others have asserted, that not only Upper and Lower Canada, but Halifax, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, must be wrested from the British Government, and annexed to our own. When I hear gentlemen indulge in such bold flights of fancy, they appear to me never to have seriously considered the hazard and uncertainty of the enterprise, the benefits to be derived from the attainment, nor the cost of the acquisition. The Government of the Canadas alone costs Great Britain more than one million sterling annually. If she would surrender to the United States her jurisdiction of all her North American colonies, my decided opinion is, that it would be bad policy to accept of them. The nature of their Government, and the mixed character of its inhabitants, would illy comport with the genius of our free institutions. In addition to this, the location of these provinces, being accessible by fleets, and some of them having very safe and capacious harbors, would require a great naval as well as Military Establishment to protect and maintain them. But this is not the most unpleasant part of the picture. I apprehend much greater difficulties will be found in the attainment of these objects than some gentlemen seem to be aware of. To appreciate the truth of this remark, gentlemen will do well to review the events of the war between France and Great Britain, as carried on in America, which closed with the peace of 1763. At that time the British colonies in North America, (now the United States,) afforded all the aid in their power to assist the mother country in the conflict. The expense was enormous, and human blood flowed in torrents from Fort Duquesne (now Pittsburg) to Ticonderoga, and from Ticonderoga to Quebec. The sanguinary conflict on the plains of Abraham, in which the gallant commanders of both armies fell, decided the fate of that city.

The frequent and unsuccessful attempts to get possession of the Canadas during the Revolutionary war may afford some useful lessons on this subject. The city of Quebec, both from its natural position and the strength of its defensive works, may be considered one of the strongest fortresses in the world. Suppose then these provinces should be overrun by our arms, so that all the lakes and land north and west of Montreal should be in our possession; I inquire if it would be good policy in this Government to maintain a military force in the field equal to the investment of Quebec? If a garrison of twelve or fifteen thousand regular troops may now be supposed to be quartered there; and capable of being increased the next Summer, to double that number, I beg gentlemen to make some rational estimate as to the force which it would be necessary to send into that country. I presume the most sanguine friends of this war do not expect that Quebec will fall during the first campaign; and if we should continue the Army for a second, I fear our present Military Establishment would be unequal to the service.

The inference from the whole is, that the prospect of success is very doubtful at least; but even if we could insure success, the price to be paid would far, very far, overbalance the value of the object when attained.

But the prosecution of the war upon the plan of invasion heretofore adopted will bring with it a train of evils not easily to be foreseen. Can any man in his senses believe that a proud, warlike, and haughty nation will suffer invasion upon her territories, and not attempt that retaliation which lies so much within her reach? Must the glory and beauty of our seaport towns, the elegance and wealth of our cities, and the comfort and happiness of thousands, and even millions of our fellow-citizens be jeopardized to the miserable policy and infatuated system of invading Canada? Be assured, Mr. Chairman, the price is too great, and sooner or later the sober reflecting part of this injured people will teach the authors of this war, that their prosperity and happiness are not to be trifled with, or idly thrown away.

But, sir, when I consider the facility with which the enemy can bring distress, of the most heart-rending sort, to the very bosoms of our Southern brethren, I stand astonished at the presumption and rashness with which they seem to court the contest. If gentlemen will persist in this bloody war, they must be told that calamity and misery will be their portion. The hand of the assassin is within their own dwellings, and for aught I know the Providence of God permits this awful delusion, that vengeance may come on the most ardent authors and abettors of this war to the uttermost. Before these awful judgments shall take place, I conjure gentlemen to pause, and to remember this caution, which is given in the spirit of friendship, before it be too late. Already have we heard, and the information filled my mind with horror, that several thousand black troops were ready in the West Indies to begin this work of slaughter and destruction; and those who will suffer themselves to reflect must know that the nation which we have chosen for our enemy has the means at command to effect the dreadful work. But I will dismiss this painful picture with a single remark, which the subject not only justifies, but calls for. It is this: that those parts of the United States which seemed most secure, and where this war fever has raged the most, seem to have already been visited, and in my judgment must be visited, by a righteous Providence with the severest calamities growing out of this war. In proof of this fact look at the incursions of the savages along the whole line of our Western and Southern frontier; and if the scene is not too dreadful even to contemplate, let the slaveholding States look at their true situation, and not hasten an event which may even rival St. Domingo for suffering and wo.

But, say the friends of this war and of this bill, what would you have us do? Would you repeal the declaration of war, and deliver us over, bound hand and foot, to the enemy? To this I have a two-fold answer: First, if you would rush madly on to ruin, regardless of all advice, as well as of the most fatal consequences, it is no part of my business to extricate you from trouble; but, secondly, I reply that the path of duty is the only path of safety. The country may yet be saved by pursuing an honorable, impartial, and enlightened policy with respect to the two great belligerents. Although I cannot at this time presume to point out the only proper course which this Government ought to pursue, yet following the example of some others who have preceded me in this debate, my project shall be submitted with frankness and freedom.

I say, then, let this Government immediately take honorable, impartial, and tenable ground, and the country will support us. Determine to defend our territory, and all the citizens who inhabit the soil, and bid defiance to all Europe and the world, to drive us from our domain. Away with the silly Frenchified doctrine, "that a ship is a floating colony," and as such must be defended as a part of the territory. While we demand as our right that our native citizens shall freely navigate the ocean, let us scrupulously avoid decoying foreigners into our service; and if we guard this part of our navigation code by suitable penalties, I cannot believe the difficulties relating to a friendly intercourse would be insurmountable.

From the foregoing remarks I draw the following conclusions: 1st. That the conquest of Canada, and the other British provinces in North America, will be very difficult, if not impossible; 2d. That if we should succeed eventually in subduing them, the expense in blood and treasure would greatly exceed their value to the United States; 3d. That if these territories should be incorporated into the Union, it is probable, if not certain, that a separation of the present United States would be the consequence.

The late hour of the day, and the fatigue of the Committee, ought to admonish me to close my remarks. Had I time, and if I could prevail on the Committee to hear me, I would certainly reply to the remark, so often repeated, that the President had fully evinced his desire for peace, inasmuch as he made overtures to that effect immediately after the declaration of war. I will, however, very briefly remark, that, although a copy of the instructions given to Mr. Russell was not communicated to Congress when the President sent us the last correspondence of Mr. Russell with the British Government, yet it is sufficiently manifest that he was necessarily limited in his powers; and, although he seems to have felt somewhat wounded by the intimation of Lord Castlereagh, as to the object and sufficiency of his powers, yet, after telling his Lordship, in his letter of September 19, 1812, "that he did not expect to hear repeated any objections on these points," he is obliged to apologize to his own Government for having acted thus extensively, and I may even add unwarrantably, under his instructions. He says in his letter, bearing date London, September 17, 1812, (which he brought himself, or more probably wrote in this place,) "had the proposition been adopted, I should not have been without all hope that it would have been approved by the President." Enough has been said, I trust, to induce us at least to doubt the declarations in extenso, so often made within this hall and out of it, that the olive branch has been constantly and fairly tendered to the enemy, and that it was rejected with disdain.

I have now finished the remarks which I intended to make on the bill before the Committee. I will trespass on their patience but a few minutes longer, while I state one further objection to the continuance of this war, which will be derived solely from the moral state of the world, and the peculiar character of the war in that respect. Whatever impression the following reflections may make on the minds of others, I hope I shall be credited when I say that, from this consideration alone, arguments and reasons more unanswerable than any or all others, force themselves upon my judgment, and oblige me to reprobate the war.

We live at a period, Mr. Chairman, the most solemn and eventful that this fallen world has ever witnessed. No believer in the Christian religion can be an inattentive observer of the astonishing scenes now acting on the human theatre. While the great events foretold in prophecy are unfolding in regular and rapid succession, the kingdoms and nations on the earth are solemnly forewarned how to conduct, that the calamities and judgments threatened against the ungodly may not overtake them. The whole civilized world is now in arms; and while continental Europe is convulsed to its centre, and has for many years been suffering the judgments of an holy God, for her impieties and her crimes, a great portion of the people of Great Britain have been exerting themselves to spread the knowledge and influence of that religion which alone can remove the malady and heal the nations. While societies and institutions have been formed for this most benevolent purpose in Great Britain, many of our own countrymen have united with them in the glorious work of sending the Holy Scriptures to the heathen throughout the world; thereby introducing light, and peace, and joy, into the abodes of ignorance, hostility, and wo. Is it then a matter of no consequence to the people of this country that these fair and happy prospects should be checked, and, perhaps, blasted forever, by this unhappy war? And can it be unworthy the legislators of a Christian people to reflect that they are now waging an offensive war, and one which, in its consequences, may be found to be directed against Him who is the God of Armies? It is also a most deplorable consideration that a continuance in this war may unite us to the destinies of those against whom the Great Jehovah is now pouring out the full vials of his wrath. This is the bitterest ingredient in the cup, of which we have begun to drink. When I reflect on these awful and solemn events, I cannot but weep for my infatuated country; and if I had an angel's voice I would call on every rational creature in these United States, as well as on this honorable Committee, and entreat them to pause and consider, before our country's doom shall be forever sealed.

When Mr. T. concluded, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 8.

Mr. DINSMOOR presented a resolution of the Legislature of New Hampshire, requesting their delegation in Congress to procure the passage of a law raising the wages of the militia detached from that State.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill for the relief of J. Binnick was read a third time and passed.

MOUNTED RANGERS.

Mr. JENNINGS said, that it must be recollected by the House, that the act which was passed at the last session of Congress, for the raising certain companies of rangers for the protection of the frontiers, had expired. Those rangers were raised under the apprehension of attacks from the savages; and these apprehensions have unfortunately been realized far beyond the general anticipation. When those companies were raised, Mr. Speaker, we expected long since to have taken possession of the British Province of Upper Canada, thereby to have intercepted the connexion and communication between the British and the northwestern Indians. It will therefore readily be perceived, that in consequence of our disappointed expectations in that quarter, the northwestern frontier will be more exposed to the savage knife and tomahawk, at the opening of the approaching Spring, than they have been heretofore. This description of force, if again organized, and stationed at suitable points without the frontier settlements, will render it more efficient, and in a better situation to range the woods and prevent the unapprized attack of the savage upon the helpless women and children. If we had to expect invasion from a civilized foe, our situation would not excite so much terror, but the savage character draws no distinction between the helpless infant and the prisoner of war. Under such circumstances, no calculation of expenditure ought to have any weight against a measure calculated to afford a necessary and proper protection to such an important and extensive frontier of the United States. The secrecy and facility with which the savages can assail that frontier, renders it improper that we should depend entirely for protection upon the volunteers and militia of an adjoining State. They carry with them their prejudices, and too often forget the sacred rights of private property.

H. OF R.

This fact has unfortunately been verified by a petition which I presented yesterday from the Territory which I represent. But I cannot believe that such is the character of the citizens of Kentucky, although I do believe, that the cause of that plundering, so far as it did take place in the western part of the Territory of Indiana, by a portion of the Kentucky volunteers, may be found in the unhallowed exertions of local political purposes, to impress on the minds of at least some of those volunteers, that they were to defend British agents, British partisans, and persons having connexion with the savages.

I shall now (said Mr. J.) present to the House the following resolutions, which I have prepared, as well for the purpose of offering a bounty in lands to those who would volunteer their services as rangers for the protection of the northwestern frontier, as for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of paying the militia and volunteers who have already rendered important services in shielding the helpless from savage cruelty—

“Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to raise at least twelve companies of rangers, by the acceptance of volunteers or enlistment for one year, to be mounted or otherwise, as the service may require.

“Resolved, That the said committee inquire into the expediency of allowing a bounty in land to those who shall tender their services as rangers, and be accepted by the President of the United States.

“Resolved, That the said committee inquire likewise into the expediency of making provision for compensating the militia or volunteers, who may have been called out, or whose services may have been accepted by the Executives of either of the Territories of the United States.”

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate authorizing the raising of twenty thousand men, for one year, if in the opinion of the President of the United States the public service shall require it.

MR. WHEATON said: Mr. Speaker, every intelligent man, whose age has given him an opportunity of combining experience with observation, must know that there are times when, on certain questions relating to the great interests of the nation, the sober remonstrances of truth and reason are of little or no avail against the misguided impetuosity of public prejudice. To such a crisis, if we have not already arrived, it is greatly to be feared that we are fast approaching. To float along the current of popular opinion requires very little exertion; but the man that is placed in a situation where the public safety demands that he should stem the torrent and buffet the storm, cannot but reflect, with peculiar sensibility, on the very unequal task he has to perform. The bill, now under consideration, has opened a field of discussion on the general policy of the war, in which its advocates and opponents seem to have given full range to their imaginations; and the arguments, on both sides, have apparently been attended with various success. There can, however, be little doubt on which side the victory will finally be declared. It is well known that the majority are determined, and the bill will pass. I had therefore resolved to take no part in the dispute, but to content myself with giving a simple vote. But, reflecting that I am called upon to act on a subject by me deemed important, not only for myself, but for the good of the people whom I have the honor to represent, who will be equally interested in the result, I have felt myself impelled, both by duty and inclination, to state some of the reasons on which that vote will be grounded.

The bill proposes giving authority to the President of the United States to raise twenty thousand regular troops, in addition to the thirty-five thousand already authorized by law. This may be right or wrong, proper or improper, according to times and circumstances, and the objects which the measure is contemplated to effect. Were the country invaded by a foreign foe, and a foe so powerful as to make this additional number of troops necessary for its defence, I should say it were right and proper to raise them, whatever expense it might be to the nation. But if, as the advocates of the bill profess, these men are to be enlisted, and, together with those heretofore authorized, are to form a powerful army for the purpose of foreign conquest, I have no hesitation in giving it, as my opinion, that it is improper and wrong, or, at least, as the President has told us respecting the French decree repealing those of Berlin and Milan, that “the proceeding is rendered, by the time and manner of it, liable to many objections.” Objections, it is apprehended, may arise from want of powers given to Congress by the Constitution, either expressed or implied, to do this thing, with its professed object in view—that is, foreign conquest. And if these are unavailing, common reason and common sense furnish objections, sufficiently strong, to the expediency of our undertaking such enterprises. Objections, for want of sufficient powers given by the Constitution, may be considered as novel; but, if sound, they should nevertheless prevail. The war itself is novel, this being the first of the kind that ever we have undertaken since that instrument was formed, or since we became an independent nation. If the Constitution gives Congress any power to carry on foreign wars, those powers must be collected from expressions it contains, or from some clear and necessary implication from something that is therein expressed. It will be very readily admitted, that our national Government is a Government of a very simple construction, and that it possesses very limited powers; being established by compact, not by conquest, it has not all the powers incident to the sovereignties of other countries; not produced by conquest, it was not made for conquest. “The enumeration of certain rights in the Constitution shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people;” and the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are ‘ reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.’ The framers of this Constitution took particular care, not only to define the powers they intended to give, but the objects to which that power should be applied, and therefore, but for those defined objects, Congress have no powers at all. The objects are first pointed out clearly and plainly, and then the powers necessary to their attainment. The people of this country, after having effected the Revolution and established their independence, considering their great transmarine distance from the nations of the Old World, and all their jarring and rival interests, flattered themselves with the expectation of long peace. Unapprehensive of being attacked at home, they had no idea of making war for the purpose of conquest abroad. “Peace and friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none,” was their motto, and the same sentiment has been sanctioned by a man, whom the advocates of this war have never ceased to admire. An aversion to standing armies was among the causes that induced the Declaration of Independence; without standing armies, it was then believed, and we now know full well, foreign wars cannot be carried on. Foreign wars did not, therefore, come within the scope of that policy that dictated the Constitution. I am not insensible, that, by the Constitution, a power is given to Congress to declare war, (not to make it,) but their power is not to be exercised but in the spirit of that instrument, and for the attainment of some or all of the objects for which it was framed. And what are those objects? Why, and for what was the Constitution made? Its authors have told us. It was for “the forming of a more perfect union, establishing justice, insuring domestic tranquillity, providing for the common defence, promoting the general welfare, and securing the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity,” and all these benefits for the people that then did, or who thereafter should, belong to, or reside in the territory then embraced by the United States, and none other. The Constitution was not made for any other, nor can it give jurisdiction over any other. If all or any of these objects are endangered, and it can be made to appear that raising the additional army proposed by this bill be necessary to the preservation and security of them, and can afford a rational prospect of producing such an effect, then my objections to the measure, so far as they arise from the apprehension of the want of Constitutional authority, will be obviated. But here, permit me to ask, whether adding twenty thousand new troops to our present regular army, will be likely to have the effect of forming a more perfect union among the people of these States, or whether the little progress already made in the war has not produced fearful apprehensions of a sad reverse? If justice be not already established in our country, can there be any probability that a more formidable army will effect an object so desirable? No; for it is a well-known maxim, as true now, as in those ancient times when it was written, that “Inter arma leges silent.” So romantic an idea, as being able to establish justice through the world, could not have entered the heads of those that framed the Constitution. Much has been said respecting the laws of nations; but they are now no where to be found, but in those books that treat on that subject; they were formed by the nations of the civilized world, and evidenced by the treaties, compacts, and agreements, entered into by them; but the Governments of Europe, in their struggle for power and dominion, seem to have disregarded or broken them down; and they being the majority in number, and superior in strength, it is not at present in our power to build up and enforce them. The unavoidable state of the world must be submitted to, until human nature shall, by its Great Author, be corrected. Nor can we, from what we have experienced, promise ourselves, from foreign war, an increase of tranquillity at home. But we are authorized, and are bound to provide for our common defence, and to raise armies, as well of regulars as militia, for that purpose, whenever the unfortunate situation of our country may render such a measure necessary; and our raising of a regular army could never have been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution for any other purpose, and therefore give no authority so to do, and, as if conscious that this were the case, the committee that penned the act passed by Congress in June last, declaring war, made use of a form altogether unusual in other countries on similar occasions. The act declares that “war exists between the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, and the United States;” going upon the idea, that hostilities had then been actually commenced against us by that Government, and our country invaded by a British armed force. Such a doctrine would have been very proper, and it might have been proper to raise armies in pursuance of it, had it been true. But such was not the fact. No hostile invasion of the country, by the British Government, had then been made, attempted or threatened. But some may say, and do say, that, if it were not a point then, it is now, and that, therefore, if we had no right to raise regular armies then, it being a time of peace, we may feel ourselves fully authorized now, since war has been declared, to raise new ones, or make additions to the old. This, indeed, would be contrary to a principle universally received and adopted, that no one should be permitted to take the advantage of his own wrong.

I know it is a doctrine, that the ruling party in this country, both in and out of this House, are every day zealously endeavoring to inculcate, that even admitting the war to have been wrong, at its commencement, it has now become the Constitutional duty of its original opponents to afford every aid and encouragement to its prosecution. But this is a doctrine that I think no one can yield his assent to, till he is made to believe, that two lines, constantly diverging, may finally meet in the same point. If our country has been in any degree invaded, and such invasion be in consequence of our having first invaded the territories of the invaders, it is proper for us, by withdrawing the cause, to put an end to the effect. The last, and not the least object of the powers given by the Constitution, is "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves, and our posterity." Many arguments cannot be necessary to show the tendency of foreign wars to destroy liberty. I believe history does not furnish an instance of any people long free, after engaging in the mad projects of foreign conquest. While Rome was content with her ancient boundaries, her inhabitants were blest with freedom; but, afterwards, jealousies, tumults, insurrections, and seditions, and those two great plagues and scourges of mankind, anarchy and tyranny, following in the train, destroyed every vestige of liberty among that people. Is there any liberty left among the people of France, or of those countries that France has conquered? Fortunate for them, if they are less enlightened than we are; for, in such case, though slaves, they may not be quite so miserable ones. "The very age and body of our Constitution, its form and pressure," indicative of the genius and temper of the people that adopted it, are all opposed to the prosecution of wars for conquest. Such enterprises must not be undertaken, or the Constitution must be destroyed. Gentlemen seem already inclined to attribute the disgrace and defeats that have hitherto marked our progress in this war, rather to the form and Constitution of our Government, than to the weakness and folly of its Administration. The French Emperor has been extolled, and his mode of conducting wars has been more than intimated as being worth our imitation. If, in making foreign conquests, we would have his success, we must make use of his means, and then we may bid adieu to our former happy institutions, our laws, and our liberty. On this ground, therefore, I am opposed to the progress of this war. But if I had not a scruple left, as to the authority given to Congress by the Constitution to make this war for conquest, (and perhaps I ought not to have,) my sense of its inexpediency, while I shall have any regard for the welfare and prosperity of my country, will forever forbid my giving it the smallest aid.

A war, admitting circumstances to be such as to render it justifiable on moral principle, (and an offensive war I think never can be,) admitting, also, that the Government of the country is authorized by its Constitution to make it, may be expedient or inexpedient, according to the value of the object proposed to be obtained, the probability of obtaining it, and the inconvenience and expense attending it. The avowed object of progressing in the war that has been undertaken, for which these men are proposed to be raised, is the conquest of the Canadas, and, some say, all the British possessions in America. Of what probable value will the Canadas be to the United States, should we succeed in conquering them? Do we want more land? We now have within the country, over which the Constitution was intended to give jurisdiction, many millions of acres, as yet untrodden by the foot of civilized man. Do we want a conquered people, that cannot be kept in subjection without a permanent regular army? Or is it intended, when conquered, to embrace them as fellow-citizens? The Canadians are British subjects, they have British prejudices, and are attached to the British Government; and shall we be willing that they should have an hand in governing us, and thereby increase the British influence among us, said to be too great already? I think not. The condition of our country must be vastly more happy without holding them, either as conquered provinces, or taking them into any connexion with us. They wish not to injure us; we ought not to injure them. But what is the probability of our speedily effecting this mighty conquest, if we could anticipate any great benefit or advantage from it? Our past attempt affords little encouragement as to the future. Our troops, though they might be valiant in a better cause, have given little evidence of their zeal in this. Experience has indeed established the fact, that it is no easy task to conquer any people, determined to defend themselves, unless recourse is had to those intrigues which we condemn in other nations. It is true, that this very country has been once conquered; but, at that time it contained but a small proportion of inhabitants to what it now does; and it may be well recollected, that that conquest was not effected till after a severe struggle of a number of years continuance, by the people then inhabiting the territory now constituting the United States, aided by the land and naval forces of Great Britain, with a man at their head, who, for that very exploit, then thought almost miraculous, has been celebrated in song from that day to this.

But although it may be admitted possible, that with many and great difficulties, the loss of much blood, and the expense of much treasure, such a conquest may be made, provided the whole physical strength of the United States could at once be pointed to that object, yet the prospect is still dubious; for a union in such an enterprise cannot at present take place. And the reason is plain; it is because the people cannot be made to believe it an object worth their pursuit. The gentlemen who are the advocates of this war, are constantly complaining of a want of union among the people in its prosecution, and calling upon us to unite with them; but this cannot be without the sacrifice of principle, which we ought to hold more valuable than both Canadas. Nor can the people be ever induced to make this conquest an object with them, as long as they are permitted to think and speak and act for themselves; and how long that will be, is known only to Him who holds the destinies of nations in His hands, and to whose all-seeing eye the past and the future are equally open. But, however alarming may be the prospect, and however confident we may be of accomplishing the design, it would have been wise in us before we began, and it will be wise in us now, before we further proceed in our attempts to conquer those countries, well to consider what will be the probable cost. And here I must request the aid of those that are more curious at computation than myself, to cast up the mighty sum. If it be only forty millions a year, as some gentlemen candidly suppose, and seven years in the operation, it will be two hundred and eighty millions; a sum, that the whole people of the United States cannot at present pay, and the very interest of which must be an intolerable burden for many years to come. Of this, they will be made sensible, when the tax-gatherers shall be found knocking at the poor man's door. And if the possession of the Canadas should be acquired, they cannot be retained to any valuable purpose to us, nor without ruin to the inhabitants, unless we can also command the river St. Lawrence, their only outlet to the ocean; and in order to this, we must also have New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The conquest of those countries has indeed been talked of (though somewhat faintly) as being within the view of the advocates of the war. The taking of Halifax may be a picture in the head of fame, but if attempted with our present means, will be found to be a pang in the heart of many. The thing may be talked of pompously, it may be even recommended gravely; but, after all, our experience must despair of it irretrievably. But if the possession of these British provinces be attainable, and if easily attained, will this be likely to have the effect of inducing that Government against which we are conducting this war, to relinquish the claim relating to the impressment of seamen; which seems to be the great, and, indeed, at present, the only point of dispute between us? If not, then our wishes will not give us our wish, and success will only teach us to despair. Gentlemen say that Great Britain, when more depressed than she is now, when surrounded by a world in arms, would pay no attention to our remonstrances on that subject. And do we expect to coerce that nation into a compliance with our demands, by taking from her a little, frozen, barren territory, which has been to her, as it must be to us, if acquired, more expense in keeping it, than any advantage that ever has been, or ever can be derived from it? If we wish to establish and secure our rights upon the water, it is upon that element that we must be prepared to contend, if we contend at all. That a single native American citizen should be taken on board a British ship of war, and be there compelled to serve against his will, is much to be regretted; and that there have been such instances there cannot be a doubt; although I believe the number to be much smaller than has generally been represented. But it being acknowledged to be an evil, and a great evil, the question is, what is the proper remedy to be applied; and what remedy we are able to apply, without increasing, rather than diminishing the evil. The evil has grown out of circumstances beyond our control. Before the war commenced between England and France, we had no complaints on this subject to make; and probably never should have had, had it not been for the great similarity in language, complexion, habits, and manners, that exists between the English and American sailors; and had it not been, that many of the former had come into our service. The British Government, although they always insisted on their right to the services of their own men in time of war, have never claimed ours, but have always expressed a willingness to release any that might be in their employ, that should be ascertained to be American. Hence, though the impressment of our seamen has been a subject of complaint under every Administration, it has always been considered, until the present unfortunate crisis, as a thing to be obviated by negotiation rather than war. And if the passions excited by the Revolution had not survived that struggle, and the calamities of that war had been forgotten when the sword was sheathed, there would probably have been much less difficulty in coming to an amicable adjustment on this subject, than there has been. Indeed, if the treaty negotiated by the present Secretary of State, in 1806, had been accepted and confirmed by the then Executive of the United States, we might have still remained a prosperous and happy people, and escaped all the calamities of the present war. Those, therefore, that delight in war, may bless the memory of that man; but those that prefer peace must execrate it forever.

There are evils in the world, that arise out of the present unconnected state of human nature, from which we cannot claim nor expect a total exemption. From the wars in Europe our country has derived great advantages—advantages that have been more than a balance for all the evils we have suffered from them. Was it, then, wise and prudent in us to cast this balance of good away, because we could not obtain an entire exemption from evil? Or is it now wise in us to continue the war against England because, in seeking for their own men that have been taken on board our vessels, they may, by mistake, take and for some time detain some of ours, when it is certain that this will put in their power ten times as many whose release we shall be unable to procure till the war is ended?

Gentlemen, reluctant at the destruction of the harmless Canadians, in order to impress on our minds the necessity of a further progress in the war, have endeavored to awaken our sympathies by a recital of Indian barbarities. But, however savage and barbarous when provoked, it will be found on examination that that wretched portion of the human race "are more sinned against than sinning." They will leave us undisturbed if we do not disturb them. After all, if nothing else be sufficient to rouse the people to arms, it is said that our honor as a nation is at stake, and we must fight for that, and for that the patriotism of the country is to be put in requisition and tested. There was a time when patriotism was a word of pleasing import, honor of charming sound; the one struck the imagination, and the other engaged the affections with a fond, a winning address. But these words seem now to have lost their original meaning, and having become so tarnished by so frequently passing through the mouths of such and so many, it is almost time to lay them aside as inelegant and obsolete. That principle, once known by the term of honor, is always within our own keeping. If we have lost it, it is a fault of our own and not chargeable to the conduct of any other nation or Government, and we cannot regain it by fighting; and if we have it, and choose to keep it, not even the great Napoleon himself can deprive us of it, notwithstanding he may see fit to publish to the world, as he has done, that we are a people "without just political views, without honesty, and without honor—that our independence is but a name, and Congress inferior to a Jamaica Assembly." If we be true to ourselves and just to others, and act like a nation of Christians, we shall be honorable. Nor shall we give any very strong evidence of love to our country by engaging in a contest wherein the certain loss might far exceed the probable gain. The Committee on Foreign Relations have told us that they are not of that sect that worship at the shrine of calculating avarice; but unless we can procure something from that sect with which to make a sacrifice at the shrine of ambition, the deity who there presides will not look upon us with a very propitious eye. It is the palm and not the laurels that this nation wants. I am sensible that opposition to the present war is considered by some as evidence of a friendly disposition towards Great Britain and hostility to our own country. But in this gentlemen are mistaken. It is because I love my country that I hate the war. It is true that many of the institutions and laws, that are of British origin, which have been adopted and practised upon in the United States and become part of our common law, cannot fail to attract the admiration and approbation of every well informed and well disposed man—and if this be sufficient to denominate a British partisan then I am not unambitious of the name. But having been born in this country, having lived in it from my birth, being able to trace up my ancestry in it for more than a century, and having no connexions abroad, in interest or affection, my views and my feelings are wholly American. Some gentlemen have undertaken to state that there is a party in this country prejudiced against their own, and strongly in favor of the British Administration. And to prove this the Henry plot (so called) has been introduced into the discussion, as containing some very valuable discoveries, which, admitted to have cost fifty thousand dollars, are affirmed to be worth a million. Those communications, however, when thoroughly examined, are not found to contain anything very new, and of course one might suppose them not to be quite so valuable. For although it is therein stated that the then Administration was "a muddy commixture of folly, weakness, and duplicity," assurance is given that "the opposition party do not freely entertain the project of withdrawing the Eastern States from the Union." But if indeed those discoveries were worth a million of dollars, they were not worth the sacrifice of a single truth by an honest man. The communication of them was made to Congress on the 9th of March last, as having been received in a letter dated at Philadelphia, the 20th of February last, notwithstanding it has been ascertained that they were bought and paid for as early as the 11th of the same month.

I have never been made to believe that there is any number of men in this country that wish, or who would acquiesce in its subjection to Great Britain, nor indeed to France. Yet it is impossible for me wholly to exclude from my mind the belief that our Administration, either through fear, favor, or affection, have been in some degree partial to the latter. As evidence of it, it is unnecessary, at present, to look any further back than to the passage of the act of the 2d of May, 1810, from which, through a chain of events, the present war has resulted. That act invited, in a new form, a termination of the French edicts and the British Orders in Council against our neutral commerce; but it was unfortunately passed without a full knowledge of our existing relations with the former at the time. The French Emperor, on the 23d of March preceding, had made a decree, which had not then been published, and was to us wholly unknown, for the sequestration of all American property found within his ports. This violent proceeding against every principle of justice having come to the knowledge of our Government, the then Secretary of State, in his letter of the 5th of June following, very properly directed Mr. Armstrong to inform the French Government that if the arrangement contemplated by the law should be acceptable, yet it was not the purpose of the President to proceed in giving it effect, in case the late seizure of the property of the citizens of the United States should have been followed by an absolute confiscation, and restoration finally refused: and yet, after being informed by Mr. Armstrong's letter of the 12th of September that such restoration had been absolutely refused, he did proceed in giving effect to the war, in favor of France. And in a letter of our Secretary to Mr. Armstrong of the 15th of July, in the same year, he very humbly states, that, "if it should be necessary for you to meet the question, whether the non-intercourse will be removed against Great Britain, in case she should not comprehend, in the repeal of her edicts, her blockades, which are not consistent with the laws of nations, you may, should it be found necessary, let it be understood that a repeal of the illegal blockades of a date prior to the Berlin decree, namely, that of May 1806, will be included in the condition required of Great Britain;" a thing not named in the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, nor contemplated when the act of May was passed. He then goes on to say, in a strain still more humble, that "with respect to blockades of a subsequent date, or not against France, you will press the reasonableness of leaving them, together with future blockades, not warranted by public law, to be proceeded against by the United States, in the manner they may choose to adopt." Now, why all this should be said, unless there be some secret understanding, that nothing is to be done by our Government without the consent of that of France, even when the interest of France is not concerned, it is difficult to determine. At any rate, we are now engaged in a war on the side of France against Great Britain, and the effect of it must be, if it has any effect at all, other than bringing ruin on ourselves, to increase the power of the former, and diminish or destroy that of the latter; and thus we are to assist the great Napoleon, in whose hands a treaty is no more than a twist of rotten silk, in all his projects of ambition,

"To canton out the kingdoms of the earth,
In frantic fits of visionary power,
To soothe his pride, and bribe his fellow-madmen."

To this I cannot give my consent; but even at the hazard of the imputation of being a British partisan, I feel myself compelled to say that I rejoice that there is still remaining on earth one nation whose monarch has the power, and in the hearts of whose subjects there is a disposition to set bounds to the overwhelming influence of that man, who, like some proud river that has left his banks, is threatening inundation to the world. My soul sickens at the thought of progressing in this war—I cannot, I will not vote for this bill.

Mr. H. CLAY (Speaker) said he was gratified yesterday by the recommitment of this bill to a Committee of the whole House, from two considerations: one, since it afforded to him a slight relaxation from a most fatiguing situation; and the other, because it furnished him with an opportunity of presenting to the Committee his sentiments upon the important topics which had been mingled in the debate. He regretted, however, the necessity under which the Chairman had been placed of putting the question,* precluded him from an opportunity he had wished to have enjoyed of rendering more acceptable to the Committee anything he might have to offer on the interesting points it was his duty to touch. Unprepared, however, as he was to speak on this day, of which he was more sensible from the ill state of his health, he would solicit the attention of the Committee for a few moments.

I was a little astonished, I confess, said Mr. C., when I found this bill permitted to pass silently through the Committee of the Whole, and that, not until the moment when the question was about to be put for its third reading, was it selected as that subject on which gentlemen in the opposition chose to lay before the House their views of the interesting attitude in which the nation stands. It did appear to me that the loan bill, which will soon come before us, would have afforded a much more proper occasion, it being more essential, as providing the ways and means for the prosecution of the war. But the gentlemen had the right of selection, and having exercised it, no matter how improperly, I am gratified, whatever I may think of the character of some part of the debate, at the latitude in which for once they have indulged. I claim only, in return, of gentlemen on the other side of the House, and of the Committee, a like indulgence in expressing, with the same unrestrained freedom, my sentiments. Perhaps in the course of the remarks which I may feel myself called upon to make, said he, gentlemen may apprehend that they assume too harsh an aspect; I have only now to say that I shall speak of parties, measures, and things, as they strike my moral sense, protesting against the imputation of any intention on my part to wound the feelings of any gentleman.

Considering the situation in which this country is now placed, in a state of actual war with one of the most powerful nations on the earth, it may not be useless to take a view of the past, of various parties which have at different times appeared in this country, and to attend to the manner by which we have been driven from a peaceful posture. Such an inquiry may assist in guiding us to that result—an honorable peace—which must be the sincere desire of every friend to America. The course of that opposition, by which the administration of the Government had been unremittently impeded for the last twelve years, was singular, and, I believe, unexampled in the history of any country. It has been alike the duty and the interest of the Administration to preserve peace. Their duty, because it is necessary to the growth of an infant people, their genius, and their habits. Their interest, because a change of the condition of the nation brings along with it a danger of the loss of the affections of the people. The Administration has not been forgetful of these solemn obligations. No art has been left unessayed; no experiment, promising a favorable result, left untried to maintain the peaceful relations of the country. When, some six or seven years ago, the affairs of the nation assumed a threatening aspect, a partial non-importation was adopted. As they grew more alarming, an embargo was imposed. It would have attained its purpose, but it was sacrificed upon the altar of conciliation. Vain and fruitless attempt to propitiate! Then came a law of non-intercourse, and a general non-importation followed in the train. In the meantime, any indication of a return to the public law and the path of justice, on the part of either belligerent, are seized with avidity by the Administration—the arrangement with Mr. Erskine is concluded. It is first applauded, and then censured by the opposition. No matter with what sincerity the Administration cultivates peace, the opposition will insist that it alone is culpable for any breach between the two countries. Because the President thought proper, in accepting the proffered reparation for the attack on a national vessel, to intimate that it would have better comported with the justice of the King (and who does not think so?) to punish the offending officer, the opposition, entering into the royal feelings, sees in that imaginary insult abundant cause for rejecting Mr. Erskine's arrangement. On another occasion, you cannot have forgotten the hypercritical ingenuity which they displayed to divest Mr. Jackson's correspondence of a premeditated insult to this country. If gentlemen would only reserve for their own Government half the sensibility which is indulged for that of Great Britain, they would find much less to condemn. Restriction after restriction has been tried; negotiation has been resorted to, until longer to have negotiated would have been disgraceful. Whilst these peaceful experiments are undergoing a trial, what is the conduct of the opposition? They are the champions of war; the proud, the spirited, the sole repository of the nation's honor; the exclusive men of vigor and energy. The Administration, on the contrary, is weak, feeble, and pusillanimous—"incapable of being kicked into a war." The maxim, "not a cent for tribute, millions for defence," is loudly proclaimed. Is the Administration for negotiation? The opposition is tired, sick, disgusted with negotiation. They want to draw the sword and avenge the nation's wrongs. When, at length, foreign nations, perhaps, emboldened by the very opposition here made, refused to listen to the amicable appeals made, and repeated and reiterated by the Administration, to their justice and to their interests; when, in fact, war with one of them became identified with our independence and our sovereignty, and it was no longer possible to abstain from it, behold the opposition becoming the friends of peace and of commerce. They tell you of the calamities of war; its tragical events; the squandering away of your resources; the waste of the public treasure, and the spilling of innocent blood. They tell you that honor is an illusion! Now we see them exhibiting the terrific forms of the roaring king of the forest. Now the meekness and humility of the lamb! They are for war, and no restrictions, when the Administration is for peace; they are for peace and restrictions, when the Administration is for war. You find them, sir, tacking with every gale, displaying the colors of every party, and of all nations, steady only in one unalterable purpose: to steer, if possible, into the haven of power.

During all this time the parasites of opposition do not fail by cunning sarcasm or sly inuendo to throw out the idea of French influence, which is known to be false; which ought to be met in one manner only, and that is, by the lie direct. The Administration of this country devoted to foreign influence! The Administration of this country subservient to France! Great God! how is it so influenced? By what ligament, on what basis, on what possible foundation, does it rest? Is it on similarity of language? No! we speak different tongues; we speak the English language. On the resemblance of our laws? No! the sources of our jurisprudence spring from another and a different country. On commercial intercourse? No! we have comparatively none with France. Is it from the correspondence in the genius of the two Governments? No! here alone is the liberty of man secure from the inexorable despotism which everywhere else tramples it under foot. Where, then, is the ground of such an influence? But, sir, I am insulting you by arguing on such a subject. Yet, preposterous and ridiculous as the insinuation is, it is propagated with so much industry, that there are persons found foolish and credulous enough to believe it. You will, no doubt, think it incredible (but I have nevertheless been told the fact) that an honorable member of this House, now in my eye, recently lost his election by the circulation of a story in his district, that he was the first cousin of the Emperor Napoleon. The proof of the charge was rested on a statement of facts which was undoubtedly true. The gentleman in question, it was alleged, had married a connexion of the lady of the President of the United States, who was the intimate friend of Thomas Jefferson, late President of the United States, who some years ago was in the habit of wearing red French breeches. Now, taking these premises as established, you, Mr. Chairman, are too good a logician not to see that the conclusion necessarily followed!

Throughout the period he had been speaking of, the Opposition had been distinguished, amidst all its veerings and changes, by another inflexible feature—the application of every vile epithet, which our rich language affords, to Bonaparte. He has been compared to every hideous monster and beast, from that of the Revelations to the most insignificant quadruped. He has been called the scourge of mankind, the destroyer of Europe, the great robber, the infidel, and—Heaven knows by what other names. Really, gentlemen remind me of an obscure lady in a city, not very far off, who also took it into her head, in conversation with an accomplished French gentleman, to talk of the affairs of Europe. She, too, spoke of the destruction of the balance of power; stormed and raged about the insatiable ambition of the Emperor; called him the curse of mankind—the destroyer of Europe. The Frenchman listened to her with perfect patience, and when she had ceased, said to her, with ineffable politeness: "Madam, it would give my master, the Emperor, infinite pain, if he knew how hardly you thought of him."

Sir, gentlemen appear to me to forget that they stand on American soil; that they are not in the British House of Commons, but in the Chamber of the House of Representatives of the United States; that we have nothing to do with the affairs of Europe—the partition of territory and sovereignty there—except in so far as these things affect the interests of our own country. Gentlemen transform themselves into the Burkes, Chathams, and Pitts, of another country, and forgetting, from honest zeal, the interests of America, engage, with European sensibility, in the discussion of European interests. If gentlemen ask me, if I do not view with regret and sorrow the concentration of such vast power in the hands of Bonaparte? I reply, that I do. I regret to see the Emperor of China holding such immense sway over the fortunes of millions of our species. I regret to see Great Britain possessing so uncontrolled a command over all the waters of our globe. And if I had the ability to distribute among the nations of Europe their several portions of power and of sovereignty, I would say that Holland should be resuscitated, and given the weight she enjoyed in the days of her De Witts. I would confine France within her natural boundaries—the Alps, the Pyrennees, and the Rhine—and make her a secondary naval Power only. I would abridge the British maritime power, raise Prussia and Austria to first-rate Powers, and preserve the integrity of the Empire of Russia. But these are speculations. I look at the political transactions of Europe, with the single exception of their possible bearing upon us, as I do at the history of other countries or other times. I do not survey them with half the interest that I do the movements in South America. Our political relation is much less important than it is supposed to be. I have no fears of French or English subjugation. If we are united, we are too powerful for the mightiest nation in Europe, or all Europe combined. If we are separated, and torn asunder, we shall become an easy prey to the weakest of them. In the latter dreadful contingency, our country will not be worth preserving.

Next to the notice which the Opposition has found itself called upon to bestow upon the French Emperor, a distinguished citizen of Virginia, formerly President of the United States, has never for a moment failed to receive their kindest and most respectful attention. An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) of whom, I am sorry to say, it becomes necessary for me, in the course of my remarks, to take some notice, has alluded to him in a remarkable manner. Neither his retirement from public office, his eminent services, nor his advanced age, can exempt this patriot from the coarse assaults of party malevolence. No, sir. In 1801, he snatched from the rude hands of usurpation the violated Constitution of his country, and that is his crime. He preserved that instrument, in form and substance and spirit, a precious inheritance for generations to come, and for this he can never be forgiven. How impotent is party rage directed against him! He is not more elevated by his lofty residence, upon the summit of his own favorite mountain, than he is lifted by the serenity of his mind, and the consciousness of a well-spent life, above the malignant passions and the turmoils of the day. No; his own beloved Monticello is not less moved by the storms that beat against its sides than he hears with composure (if he hears at all) the howlings of the whole British pack, set loose from the Essex kennel! When the gentleman to whom I have been compelled to allude shall have mingled his dust with that of his abused ancestors; when he shall be consigned to oblivion, or, if he lives at all, shall live only in the treasonable annals of a certain junto; the name of JEFFERSON will be hailed as the second founder of the liberties of this people, and the period of his administration will be looked back to as one of the happiest and brightest epochs in American history.

I beg the gentleman's pardon; he has secured to himself a more imperishable fame. I think it was about this time four years ago, that the gentleman submitted to the House of Representatives an initiative proposition for an impeachment of Mr. Jefferson. The House condescended to consider it. The gentleman debated it with his usual temper, moderation, and urbanity. The House decided it in the most solemn manner; and, although the gentleman had somehow obtained a second, the final vote stood, one for the proposition, 117 against it! The same historic page that transmitted to posterity the virtues and the glory of Henry the Great of France, for their admiration and example, has preserved the infamous name of the fanatic assassin of that excellent monarch. The same sacred pen that portrayed the sufferings and crucifixion of the Saviour of mankind, has recorded, for universal execration, the name of him who was guilty, not of betraying his country, but (a kindred crime) of betraying his God!

In one respect there is a remarkable difference between Administration and the Opposition—it is in a sacred regard for personal liberty. When out of power my political friends condemned the surrender of Jonathan Robbins; they opposed the violation of the freedom of the press, in the sedition law; they opposed the more insidious attack upon the freedom of the person, under the imposing garb of an alien law. The party now in opposition, then in power, advocated the sacrifice of the unhappy Robbins, and passed those two laws. True to our principles, we are now struggling for the liberty of our seamen against foreign oppression. True to theirs, they oppose the war for this object. They have indeed lately affected a tender solicitude for the liberties of the people, and talk of the danger of standing armies, and the burden of taxes. But it is evident to you, Mr. Chairman, that they speak in a foreign idiom. Their brogue betrays that it is not their vernacular tongue. What! the opposition, who in 1798 and 1799, could raise an useless army to fight an enemy three thousand miles distant from us, alarmed at the existence of one raised for a known specified object—the attack of the adjoining provinces of the enemy? The gentleman from Massachusetts, who assisted by his vote to raise the army of twenty-five thousand, alarmed at the danger of our liberties from this very army!

I mean to speak of another subject, which I never think of but with the most awful considerations. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in imitation of some of his predecessors of 1799, has entertained us with Cabinet plots, Presidential plots, which are conjured up in the gentleman's own perturbed imagination. I wish, sir, that another plot of a much more serious kind—a plot that aims at the dismemberment of our Union—had only the same imaginary existence. But no man, who had paid any attention to the tone of certain prints, and to transactions in a particular quarter of the Union for several years past, can doubt the existence of such a plot. It was far, very far from my intention to charge the opposition with such a design. No, he believed them generally incapable of it. He could not say as much for some who were unworthily associated with them in the quarter of the Union to which he referred. The gentleman cannot have forgotten his own sentiment, uttered even on the floor of this House, "peaceably if we can; forcibly if we must;" in and about the same time Henry's mission to Boston was undertaken. The flagitiousness of that embassy had been attempted to be concealed by directing the public attention to the price which the gentleman says was given for the disclosure. As if any price could change the atrociousness of the attempt on the part of Great Britain, or could extenuate in the slightest degree the offence of those citizens, who entertained and deliberated upon the infamous proposition! There was a most remarkable coincidence between some of the things which that man states, and certain events in the quarter alluded to. In the contingency of war with Great Britain, it will be recollected that the neutrality and eventual separation of that section of the Union was to be brought about. How, sir, has it happened, since the declaration of war, that British officers in Canada have asserted to American officers that this very neutrality would take place? That they have so asserted can be established beyond controversy. The project is not brought forward openly, with a direct avowal of the intention. No, the stock of good sense and patriotism in that portion of the country is too great to be undisguisedly encountered. It is assailed from the masked batteries of friendship to peace and commerce on the one side, and by the groundless imputation of opposite propensities on the other. The affections of the people are to be gradually undermined. The project is suggested or withdrawn; the diabolical parties, in this criminal tragedy, make their appearance or exit, as the audience to whom they address themselves are silent, applaud or hiss. I was astonished, sir, to have lately read a letter, or pretended letter, published in a prominent print in that quarter, written not in the fervor of party zeal, but coolly and deliberately, in which the writer affects to reason about a separation, and attempts to demonstrate its advantages to different sections of the Union, deploring the existence now of what he terms prejudices against it, but hoping for the arrival of the period when they shall be eradicated. But, sir, I will quit this unpleasant subject; I will turn from one, whom no sense of decency or propriety could restrain from soiling the carpet on which he treads, to gentlemen who have not forgotten what is due to themselves, the place in which we are assembled, nor to those by whom they are opposed. The gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PEARSON,) from Connecticut, (Mr. PITKIN,) and from New York, (Mr. BLEECKER) have, with their usual decorum, contended that the war would not have been declared, but for the duplicity of France, in withholding an authentic instrument of repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan; that upon the exhibition of such an instrument the revocation of the Orders in Council took place; that this main cause of the war, but for which it would not have been declared, being removed, the Administration ought to seek for the restoration of peace; and that upon its sincerely doing so, terms compatible with the honor and interest of this country may be obtained. It is my purpose, said Mr. C. to examine, first, into the circumstances under which the war was declared; secondly, into the causes for continuing it; and lastly, into the means which have been taken, or ought to be taken to procure peace. But, sir, I really am so so exhausted that, little as I am in the habit of asking of the House an indulgence of this kind, I feel that I must trespass on their goodness.

[Here Mr. C. sat down. Mr. NEWTON moved that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, which was done. On the next day Mr. CLAY proceeded.]

I am sensible, Mr. Chairman, that some part of the debate to which this bill has given rise, has been attended by circumstances much to be regretted, not usual in this House, and which it is to be hoped there will be no repetition. The gentleman from Boston had so absolved himself from every rule of decorum and propriety, had so outraged all decency, that I have found it impossible to suppress the feelings excited on the occasion. His colleague, whom I had the honor to follow, (Mr. WHEATON,) whatever else he might not have proved, in his very learned, ingenious, and original exposition of the powers of this Government—an exposition in which he has sought, where nobody before has looked, and nobody after him will examine, for a grant of our powers, the preamble to the Constitution—has clearly shown, to the satisfaction of all who heard him, that the power is conferred of defensive war. I claim the benefit of a similar principle, in behalf of my political friends, against the gentleman from Boston. I demand only the exercise of the right of repulsion. No one is more anxious than I am to preserve the dignity and the liberality of debate; no member more responsible for its abuse. And if, on this occasion, its just limits have been violated, let him, who has been the unprovoked cause, appropriate to himself exclusively the consequences.

I omitted yesterday, sir, when speaking of a very delicate and painful subject, to notice a powerful engine which the conspirators against the integrity of the Union employ to effect their nefarious purpose—I mean Southern influence. The true friend to his country, knowing that our Constitution was the work of compromise, in which interests apparently conflicting were attempted to be reconciled, aims to extinguish or allay prejudices. But this patriotic exertion does not suit the views of those who are urged on by diabolical ambition. They find it convenient to imagine the existence of certain improper influences, and to propagate, with their utmost industry, a belief of them. Hence, the idea of Southern preponderance—Virginia influence—the yoking of respectable yeomanry of the North, with the negro slaves, to the car of Southern nabobs.

If Virginia really cherished a reprehensible ambition, and aimed to monopolize the Chief Magistracy of the country, how was such a purpose to be accomplished? Virginia, alone, cannot elect a President, whose elevation depends upon a plurality of electoral votes and a consequent concurrence of many States. Would Vermont, disinterested Pennsylvania, the Carolinas, independent Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, and Louisiana, all consent to become the tools of an inordinate ambition? But the present incumbent was designated to the office before his predecessor had retired. How? By public sentiment; public sentiment which grew out of his known virtues, his illustrious services, and his distinguished abilities. Would the gentleman crush this public sentiment; is he prepared to admit that he would arrest the progress of opinion?
